EDITOR'S LETTER

I don't know about you, but I have a trophy sitting on the sideboard in my dining room. Sure, it's made of Legos, but it's a trophy nonetheless, one that I earned by the sweat of my brow. OK, the sweat of a bunch of other guys' brows — guys like James Cook, CeeDee Lamb and even Kyler Murray — but by the end of last season, I was sweating in my own way.

You see, my league's Super Bowl came down to an otherwise meaningless Week 17 Monday night game between San Francisco and Detroit. I was losing — with Lions wide receiver Jameson Williams going nuts on my bench — until a couple of Jauan Jennings garbage-time receptions courtesy of his college teammate Joshua Dobbs (in for an injured Brock Purdy) put me over the top.

Yes, readers, I won my fantasy league in 2024, and at the risk of boring everyone who hates hearing about other people's fantasy teams, I'd like to take a moment and bask in the glory. Plus, it can't hurt the credibility of this magazine to learn that I used principles that I read about in last year's magazine to my advantage.

But there's one principle that I simply can't escape even as I gloat over my victory. And it's this: In fantasy football, all you have to do is make the playoffs, and from there, even more than in real life, anything can happen. Things like Jennings' garbage-time receptions in a full PPR league giving you just enough to win.

You may be wondering why I was even starting Jennings in my Super Bowl. And that brings up another principle: Injuries happen, and dealing with them effectively — even through a little blind luck — is one of the keys to winning your league. Jennings was a plug-and-play for my injury-ravaged squad, and I'm sure he'd be happy to know that he came through for me.

As usual, fantasy expert Rivers McCown shares the lessons that he learned last season in what has become an annual feature in the Athlon Sports Fantasy preview. One such lesson: Beware of the rookie wide receiver who seems like a sure thing. As Marvin Harrison Jr. proved in a productive but ultimately disappointing rookie season, there's a learning curve for even the most gifted wideouts. Something for you Travis Hunter and Tetairoa McMillan cheerleaders to consider.

This year's magazine includes everything you've come to expect from our fantasy experts — rookies to watch, injury concerns, player movement impact, dynasty rankings and much more, including detailed player capsules and projected scoring.

As always, I'm grateful to our staff of fantasy experts — in particular, Luke Easterling, Craig Ellenport, Kyle Wood, Mark Ross and Ben Weinrib — and our elite group of contributors, including Matt Schauf, who wrote the player capsules in the pages that follow. We'd like to think we're arming you with everything you need to make your league's playoffs. From there? Anything's possible.

Enjoy the season.

SUPERMAN

The Buffalo Bills and Kansas City Chiefs may have been his playoff kryptonite of late, but Lamar Jackson is a true regular-season superhero, and in fantasy terms, that's what matters. Jackson is coming off a season in which he led all fantasy scorers with 512.4 total points (Athlon scoring) and 30.1 points per game. That's championship-level production.

Check out our quarterback rankings on page 58 to see what Jackson and his quarterbacking peers have in store for us in 2025.

RB | ATLANTA FALCONS

Saquon Barkley was awesome last year. So awesome that it'll be tough to repeat. It's difficult to stay healthy enough to get 345 carries in an NFL season. That's part of why Barkley had never reached 300 before 2024. Even if he stays healthy again, he'll have a tough time repeating that 5.8 yards per carry. Since 2002 — the 32-team era — only 11 RB seasons had produced 5.5-plus yards per carry on 200-plus attempts. Only Clinton Portis (2002-03) reached both levels in back-to-back seasons. Barkley entered 2024 averaging 4.3 for his career. Robinson ranked just 20th in opportunity share through Week 6 last season. He climbed to third the rest of the way, trailing only Barkley (by 0.9 percentage points) and Jonathan Taylor. He trailed Barkley by just 1.3 total PPR points over that span. Perhaps most importantly, Robinson nearly doubled Barkley in receptions. That specific usage means Robinson doesn't need as much to go his way to deliver fantasy points in 2025.

— MATT SCHAUF, ATHLON FANTASY CONTRIBUTOR

CEEDEE LAMB

WR | DALLAS COWBOYS

Last year, I went with CeeDee for my No. 1 overall pick, and I was rewarded with a Dak Prescott injury and a disappointing season from Lamb, who battled a bum shoulder of his own. But a peek under the hood reveals that things weren't so bad. Lamb gutted his way to a WR8 ranking despite missing his QB from Week 9 on. With Prescott, Lamb averaged a more-than-respectable 15.6 fantasy ppg. Dak is running out of chances before Jerry Jones blows the whole thing up, so look for him to force the issue by force-feeding his WR1. Plus, George Pickens' presence should limit the double-teams and open up the field. Which in turn makes Lamb an enticing sleeper at 1-1.

— ROB DOSTER, ATHLON MANAGING EDITOR

SAQUON BARKLEY

RB | PHILADELPHIA EAGLES

BILL STREICHER-IMAGN IMAGES

Barkley did more than just restore the value of bell-cow running backs in the NFL; he made the RB1 in fantasy more relevant than it's been the last several years. Before last season, very few running backs were being taken in the first round of fantasy drafts at all, let alone No. 1. This year, you might see five or six backs in Round 1. Bijan Robinson and Jahmyr Gibbs will go high; Derrick Henry and maybe even rookie Ashton Jeanty will be off the board in Round 1. But Barkley remains the clear No. 1 option. And while no player in NFL history has rushed for 2,000 yards twice, Barkley doesn't need another 2,000-yard season to be the best player in fantasy. Of his 15 total touchdowns last season, only two came as a receiver. If the Eagles do more with Barkley in the passing game this season, he'll be unstoppable.

— CRAIG ELLENPORT, ATHLON SENIOR EDITOR

There is no such thing as a regression-proof fantasy football player, and Saquon Barkley sure seems like a poor bet to go for 549 rushing yards over expected next year. Derrick Henry joined him as the only players in the Next Gen Stats Era to ever do that, and no other running back since 2018 has even made it to 400 yards over expected. But when you look at the offensive infrastructure, it's hard to conclude that Barkely doesn't still have historic upside. The fact that he's got an elite running quarterback in Jalen Hurts, a dominant offensive line that returns four of five starters from last year and enough passing-game weapons to keep defenses from completely keying on him makes Barkley feel inevitable again in 2025. You'll find plenty of good players at the top of your draft this year, and it's hard to be disappointed with any of the top four or five picks. But last year taught us that nobody has more of a ceiling than Barkley, and ceiling is what wins leagues.

— RIVERS McCOWN, ATHLON FANTASY CONTRIBUTOR

There's no clear-cut pick this year, and while you could make a strong case for a handful of others, Barkley feels like the best combination of high floor and high ceiling. He's still only 28 and will once again be running behind arguably the best offensive line in the NFL. He should remain the focal point of the Eagles offense, and the presence of other dynamic weapons like Jalen Hurts, A.J. Brown and DeVonta Smith will punish opposing defenses for stacking the box. He's a special talent in an ideal situation, and that's always a recipe for fantasy dominance.

— LUKE EASTERLING, ATHLON SENIOR EDITOR

JA'MARR CHASE

WR | CINCINNATI BENGALS

SAM GREENE/USA TODAY NETWORK VIA IMAGN IMAGES

Typically, I'm of the mindset to go with a running back as the No. 1 overall pick. But not this year. Ja'Marr Chase is the No. 1 wide receiver in the NFL, and he has the triple crown to prove it. And he didn't eke out this unique achievement either — finishing with 12 more receptions, nearly 200 more yards and four more touchdowns than No. 2 in each category last season. Through four seasons, Chase's 17-game average shakes out to a 108-1,488-13 line. That should play just fine for the No. 1 pick. And then there are the numerous question marks surrounding a Cincinnati defense that was 25th overall in both yards and points allowed per game. It's not hard to envision the Bengals being involved in plenty of high-scoring games in 2025, which also bodes well for Chase's chances of living up to the No. 1 billing. So for this year, I'll advocate for going against the RB grain at 1-1. (Just please stay healthy Ja'Marr; you too, Joe Burrow.)

— MARK ROSS, ATHLON CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

Historically, wide receivers have rarely gone 1-1, but Chase is a rare wide receiver. He's coming off a conspicuously quiet triple crown season that saw him set career highs in receptions (127), receiving yards (1,708) and receiving touchdowns (17). Chase, who has the most receiving touchdowns (46) in the NFL since entering the league in 2021, has never finished worse than WR13, and he's coming off a WR1 finish. For the first time in a long time, there's no preseason drama in Cincinnati with Joe Burrow, Tee Higgins and Chase all under contract. Count on the 25-year-old special talent to deliver on his premium draft cost.

— KYLE WOOD, ATHLON SENIOR EDITOR

SIZING UP THE SOPHOMORES

BY CRAIG ELLENPORT

Drafting virtually any rookie in fantasy can be risky; you just never know what you're going to get. But with one season under their belts, second-year players might provide a better outlook.

Might.

It's not just the dreaded sophomore slump you must worry about. You need to factor in team situations: Has the roster or coaching staff changed in a way that might affect a player's performance from year to year? And what about the players who didn't make a big splash as rookies last season? Are they ready to step up and justify a draft-day investment?

This year might be different than most, simply because last year was different than most. Ten of the first 13 picks in last year's draft were fantasy-relevant players (QB, RB, WR or TE), and most of them made significant fantasy impacts as rookies. There's little reason to think those players won't continue to produce at a high level, while other members of the 2024 rookie class might be ready to take the next step.

Here are some second-year players who should be on your fantasy radar.

PETER CASEY-IMAGN IMAGES

THE NEW NO. 1?

JAYDEN DANIELS, QB, WASHINGTON COMMANDERS

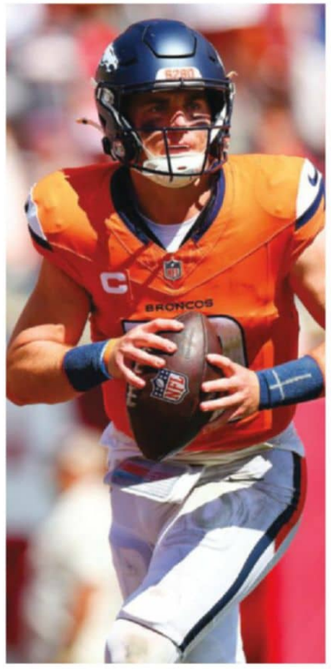
It won't be easy for the reigning NFL Offensive Rookie of the Year to top his first-year production, but it's quite possible that Daniels has room to grow.

With 3,568 passing yards, 891 rushing yards and 31 total touchdowns, Daniels was fifth among quarterbacks in fantasy points last season. And in getting the Commanders back to the playoffs for the first time in four years, Daniels showed the leadership and clutch ability to bring Washington to the brink of a Super Bowl appearance.

Not resting on Daniels' rookie laurels, the Commanders acquired receiver Deebo Samuel from the 49ers this offseason, giving Daniels a devastating one-two punch in the passing game to go with Terry McLaurin. The added weaponry will also spread the defense and make Daniels even more dangerous when he takes off on runs. Daniels was QB5 in fantasy last season, and if he plays the way he did last season, challenging to be No. 1 isn't out of the question.

BATTLE FOR SECOND

While Daniels was clearly the top rookie QB in 2024, there were five other first-round quarterbacks, and all of them could have a fantasy impact in 2025:



CLOCKWISE FROM TOP: TALIA SPRAGUE-IMAGN IMAGES; BOB DECHIARA-IMAGN IMAGES; BRETT DAVIS-IMAGN IMAGES; NATHAN RAY SEEBECK-IMAGN IMAGES

BO NIX

QB, DENVER BRONCOS

With 3,775 passing yards and 29 TD passes, Nix probably exceeded his rookie expectations last year and for a time gave Daniels a run for his money in the Rookie of the Year debate. And there's definitely room to grow in head coach Sean Payton's offense. Nix didn't top 250 passing yards in any of his first seven games but then averaged nearly 260 per game over his last seven.

Nix added another 430 rushing yards and scored four rushing touchdowns, finishing as the QB9 in fantasy. He and big-play receiver Courtland Sutton developed a great rapport, which should only get stronger, and he adds tight end Evan Engram to the mix this season as well.

CALEB WILLIAMS, QB, CHICAGO BEARS

Despite his status as a former Heisman Trophy winner and first overall draft pick last season, it's hard to expect much from Williams from a fantasy standpoint for one simple reason: He's a Chicago Bears quarterback. No quarterback in franchise history has ever thrown for 4,000 yards or 30 touchdown passes in a single season. Not one. Williams' 3,541 yards and 20 TD passes were okay, but nothing special in fantasy. He added 489 rushing yards but zero rushing touchdowns.

Enter new head coach Ben Johnson, considered the best offensive coordinator in the NFL over the past two seasons in Detroit. That gives Williams a puncher's chance to break out, but it's a risk to bet that Johnson's reputation will triumph over team history.

MICHAEL PENIX JR.

QB, ATLANTA FALCONS

The former Washington Huskies quarterback only started three games as a rookie, but that's probably three more starts than many thought he'd have at this point. When the Falcons drafted Penix with the eighth overall pick, less than two months had passed since they signed veteran free agent Kirk Cousins. The idea was that Penix had time to sit and learn from Cousins, but the rookie was installed as the team's full-time starter by season's end.

Penix takes over an offense that features a dangerous receiver in Drake London, who's coming off his best season as a pro, and one of the league's best pass-catching running backs in Bijan Robinson. That combination alone should provide a solid foundation for Penix as a successful fantasy QB.

DRAKE MAYE

QB, NEW ENGLAND PATRIOTS

Maye was drafted third overall behind Williams and Daniels, though early expectations weren't high mainly because the Patriots had no offensive identity. Maye began the season on the bench but ended up starting the final 12 games of the season. He didn't light it up, but he did show flashes — throwing at least one touchdown pass in 10 games and at least two touchdown passes four times. And that was with an inexperienced and injury-depleted receiving corps. The addition of veteran Stefon Diggs and the continued development of other receivers should lead to a marked improvement in Maye's numbers.

J.J. MCCARTHY
QB, MINNESOTA VIKINGS

Even though he was on injured reserve and never on the active roster for his rookie season, McCarthy is nevertheless technically a second-year player. A knee injury sidelined him in the preseason, and he opted for season-ending knee surgery. Sam Darnold replaced him and had a breakthrough season — but the Vikings are high enough on McCarthy that they were willing to let Darnold leave in free agency.

So what can we expect from McCarthy, who was never seen as a pure drop-back passer in his days at the University of Michigan? A quarterback who has a slew of weapons led by Justin Jefferson and is playing for one of the best offensive play-callers in head coach Kevin O'Connell is automatically viable from a fantasy perspective. Nothing was expected of Darnold last season, yet he passed for 4,319 yards and 35 touchdowns, finishing as the QB7 in fantasy. Darnold had only one rushing touchdown, so when you consider that the mobile McCarthy had eight rushing scores in two seasons as the Michigan starter, you can see a path to fantasy success.

CATCHING ON

Last year's draft featured several big-time wide receivers selected in the first two rounds. A few have already established themselves as valuable fantasy players; others have a chance to join them.

MALIK NABERS, WR, NEW YORK GIANTS

Considering that Nabers missed two games with an ankle injury and wasn't 100 percent for a few others, his rookie production was pretty historic. His 109 receptions briefly set a rookie record (Raiders tight end Brock Bowers broke that mark in his season finale). With 1,204 receiving yards and seven touchdowns, Nabers finished as the WR7 in fantasy, which is all the more impressive considering that Nabers was catching passes from the likes of Daniel Jones, Drew Lock and Tommy DeVito, all of whom were struggling behind a paper-thin offensive line. With veteran Russell Wilson presumably taking over at QB, Nabers could be a superstar.

BRIAN THOMAS JR.
WR, JACKSONVILLE JAGUARS

While his LSU teammate Malik Nabers had 22 more receptions, Thomas led all rookies in 2024 in receiving yards (1,282) and touchdowns (10). The Jaguars were confident enough in Thomas' ability to be their No. 1 receiver that they were fine letting Christian Kirk walk via free agency. It doesn't hurt that new head coach Liam Coen is an offensive guru whose reputation suggests he can help QB Trevor Lawrence get back on track and build a dynamic pass attack.

ROME ODUNZE
WR, CHICAGO BEARS

The ninth overall pick last year, Odunze posted rookie numbers (54-734-3) that were less than spectacular, but there are two good reasons to expect his production to improve markedly in 2025. For starters, Odunze and quarterback Caleb Williams will both benefit from offensive whiz Ben Johnson taking over as head coach along with some key additions that bolster the offensive line. Second, the free-agent departure of veteran Keenan Allen puts 121 targets from last season up for grabs. Odunze moves up in the pecking order and should have little trouble improving on his WR49 finish last season.

MARVIN HARRISON JR. WR, ARIZONA CARDINALS

While quarterbacks went 1-2-3 in last year's draft, some experts thought Harrison was actually the best player available — thus his selection as the fourth overall pick. Catching 62 passes for 885 yards and eight touchdowns, he was 29th among receivers in fantasy scoring. Considering Cards quarterback Kyler Murray spent much of the season working his way back from a serious knee injury, there's every reason to believe that those two will develop a better rapport in 2025. Harrison's touchdown total as a rookie was tied for 13th among receivers; his reception and yardage totals should improve greatly.

XAVIER WORTHY, WR, KANSAS CITY CHIEFS

After his record 40-yard dash time at the NFL Scouting Combine and two touchdowns in his NFL debut, it looked like the former Texas speedster was on a fast track to stardom. They production didn't match the hype, but he was a dangerous weapon that defenses had to deal with. Worthy finished as WR33, with 742 yards from scrimmage and nine total touchdowns. DeAndre Hopkins left via free agency, but Hollywood Brown looks to be a factor after missing almost the entire 2024 season, so it's hard to see Worthy becoming a reliable fantasy starter.

KEON COLEMAN WR, BUFFALO BILLS

Coleman was slowly emerging as more of a factor in the Bills' passing game before he suffered a wrist injury in Week 9. He missed four games after that and wasn't 100 percent until the last two weeks of the season. Even with the time missed, Coleman finished third on the Bills in targets. With reigning MVP Josh Allen leading the offense, it's fair to expect a healthy Coleman's numbers to improve considerably.

LADD McCONKEY WR, LOS ANGELES CHARGERS

Lining up mostly as the slot receiver in the Chargers' offense, McConkey established himself as Justin Herbert's go-to target as a rookie. In Jim Harbaugh's run-first attack, McConkey is not likely to post monster fantasy numbers, but he shouldn't have trouble matching his production from last season (82-1,149-7), which was good for WR13.

RICKY PEARSALL, WR, SAN FRANCISCO 49ERS

After a combination of injuries, which included a gunshot wound suffered when someone attempted to rob him just before his rookie season began, Pearsall wasn't active until Week 7 and was brought along slowly. He finished with 31 catches for 400 yards and three touchdowns, highlighted by a Week 17 performance against the Lions that featured eight catches for 141 yards and a score. More importantly, the trade of Deebo Samuel means that Pearsall moves into the starting lineup and will get some of the 81 targets that were aimed at Samuel last season.

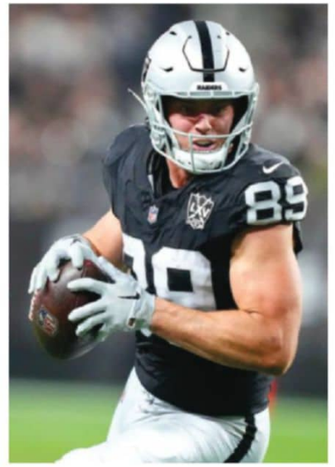
RB, TAMPA BAY BUCCANEERS

When the Bucs drafted Irving last year, fans thought he could be a nice complement to starting RB Rachaad White. By the time the season was over, it was White providing the occasional breather for Irving, who firmly established himself as Tampa Bay's starting back. He started only three games, but over the last six games of the season, he had the sixth-most fantasy points among running backs.

That ascension should continue in 2025. Irving caught 47 passes last season, although he had no receiving touchdowns. He should be a valuable back in PPR leagues and possibly one of the top RBs in fantasy.



BROCK BOWERS
TE, LAS VEGAS RAIDERS

Like Malik Nabers in New York, Bowers caught a ton of passes (112) despite being hampered by a revolving door of mediocre quarterbacks (Gardner Minshew, Aidan O'Connell, Desmond Ridder). Enter veteran Geno Smith, who should help Bowers improve on his 1,194 receiving yards. Smith's presence should also create more red-zone opportunities for the tight end from Georgia, who caught five touchdown passes last season. Bowers was the fantasy TE1 last season and should easily challenge for that honor again in '25.

ON THE MEND

Injuries can derail your fantasy fortunes in a heartbeat, and it's a helpless feeling. When your starting quarterback or top receiver goes down midseason, there's really nothing you can do about it other than cross your fingers that your backups can come through. One thing you can control is getting a handle on players who were injured last year.

Projecting how players who missed time in 2024 will perform in 2025 isn't easy. The first step is understanding the severity of the injury and what the team is expecting when training camp rolls around.

Here are some key fantasy players you need to keep tabs on after they missed time in 2024.

CHRISTIAN McCAFFREY

RB | 49ERS

After he was a consensus No. 1 pick in fantasy this time last year, it's safe to say McCaffrey's injury-plagued 2024 season crushed many a fantasy manager's hopes. McCaffrey led the NFL in yards from scrimmage (2,023) and total touchdowns (21) in 2023, but CMC opened last season on injured reserve with Achilles tendinitis in both feet. He made his season debut in Week 9, only to suffer a season-ending posterior cruciate ligament injury in Week 12. San Francisco general manager John Lynch said at the NFL Scouting Combine in February that McCaffrey, who turns 29 this summer, is looking great. "If he is healthy, he will have a tremendous year," said Lynch. "That's just what he does."

DESHAUN WATSON

QB | BROWNS

Between suspensions and injuries, Watson hasn't started more than seven games in any of his three seasons with Cleveland. The Browns are clearly thinking about who their franchise quarterback of the future will be — drafting not one, but two QBs this year. The team has 238 million reasons to want to get something more out of Watson. Problem is, he suffered a ruptured Achilles in Week 7 last season — and then required a second surgery in January after it re-ruptured. The team expects him to miss significant time. He has been aggressively rehabbing at the team's training center throughout the offseason, but it's entirely possible he has taken his last snap as a Brown.

J.J. McCARTHY

QB | VIKINGS

McCarthy's rookie season was over before it even began. The 10th overall pick in last year's draft suffered a torn meniscus in his right knee in the preseason and opted for season-ending surgery. McCarthy was an intriguing prospect because Michigan was a run-first offense, and he never threw the ball all that much in college. Still, Vikings head coach Kevin O'Connell is a quarterback whisperer who certainly worked his magic on Sam Darnold last season. The fact that Minnesota was okay letting Darnold leave via free agency after throwing 35 touchdown passes last season is a sure sign that O'Connell is confident in McCarthy as his starting quarterback. Even if McCarthy doesn't match Darnold's 35 TD passes, his running ability adds a dimension that Darnold never offered.

DAK PRESCOTT

QB | COWBOYS

The Cowboys' All-Pro quarterback didn't just suffer a hamstring injury last November. He tore the hamstring off the bone, requiring surgery that had a recovery time of three months. Spotted at a charity event in February without crutches, Prescott told reporters he was feeling good and that he would be "very, very ready" for the first game of the season. One very positive historical note: The first time Prescott missed significant playing time was in 2020, and he came back in 2021 to pass for 4,449 yards and 37 touchdowns. Then he missed five games in 2022, and he came back a year later to pass for 4,516 yards and a league-leading 36 TDs.

ON THE MEND

ISAAC GUERENDO

RB | 49ERS

Given McCaffrey's injury history — and since the 49ers' zone rushing offense has been successful in using multiple running backs — San Francisco's No. 2 RB is a smart stash for any fantasy manager. Guerendo, a fourth-round draft pick out of Louisville last year, was pressed into duty as a rookie after injuries to both McCaffrey and backup Jordan Mason. Sure enough, Guerendo suffered a late-season knee injury as well. The good news: It was not an ACL injury, so Guerendo will be ready to go for the start of the season. And the 49ers let Mason leave via free agency, so they are confident that Guerendo, who averaged five yards per carry in '24, can be McCaffrey's primary backup.

KENNETH WALKER III

RB | SEAHAWKS

Walker, according to PFF, led all NFL running backs last season with 34 broken tackles. However, that willingness to take on would-be tacklers may have contributed to Walker's multiple injuries. After missing four games earlier in the season with calf and oblique injuries, Walker missed the final two games with an ankle injury. He might have been available had the Seahawks made the playoffs, so he should be 100% when training camp opens.

TANK DELL

WR | TEXANS

At 5-foot-10 and 165 pounds, it's not shocking that Dell has been injured in each of his first two pro seasons. He missed six games as a rookie but came back strong in 2024 — only to suffer a devastating knee injury in Week 16. Dell suffered a dislocated knee, torn ACL, MCL, LCL and meniscus damage. Initial reports indicated that he might not be ready to return in 2025. In late February, Texans head coach DeMeco Ryans gave a positive update, noting that Dell was back in the building, working out and showing "renewed energy" in his recovery. That said, Ryans also stressed that it was too soon to set a timetable on Dell's return.

MICHAEL PITTMAN JR.

WR | COLTS

Pittman's 2024 numbers (69 catches, 808 yards, three touchdowns) were the lowest since his rookie season of 2020, but fantasy owners learned after the season that there was a good reason for his disappointing drop in production: he played most of the 2024 season with a fractured back. Pittman was getting scanned every few weeks during the season to make sure he was okay to play through the pain, for which he clearly has a high tolerance. In January, it was reported that Pittman's injury would not require surgery, and all signs point to him being ready to go when training camp begins.

BRANDON AIYUK

WR | 49ERS

Aiyuk had his breakout season in 2023, with 75 catches for 1,342 yards and seven touchdowns, earning him a nice new contract extension. But then he suffered a season-ending ACL and MCL injury last October. The team is optimistic that Aiyuk will be ready to go Week 1. The fact that San Francisco was willing to trade away star receiver Deebo Samuel and not invest a high draft pick in the position is a sign of that optimism. The 49ers still have Jauan Jennings, Ricky Pearsall and free-agent addition Demarcus Robinson in their WR room, but Aiyuk should still get his share of targets.

HOLLYWOOD BROWN

WR | CHIEFS

The Chiefs signed Brown last year to team up with Rashee Rice and rookie Xavier Worthy, but Brown suffered a sternoclavicular injury in his first preseason game that landed him on injured reserve. Brown was supposed to miss the entire season, although he did make it back for the final two games of the regular season and played sparingly in the playoffs. The Chiefs were happy enough with what little they saw of Brown that they made sure to re-sign him before free agency began. Speed is the key to his game, so the fact that it was an upper-body injury that sidelined him last season shouldn't be a great concern.

TROY TAORMINA-IMAGN IMAGES

XAVIER LEGETTE

WR | PANTHERS

Legette missed a little time in 2024 with a wrist injury, but it was actually a nagging foot injury that required offseason surgery. After catching 49 passes for 497 yards and four touchdowns as a rookie, Legette was told that rest was the best medicine for his wrist. Legette was spotted at the Kentucky Derby after having apparently bulked up considerably, so his recovery is obviously not affecting his workout regimen.

STEFON DIGGS

WR | PATRIOTS

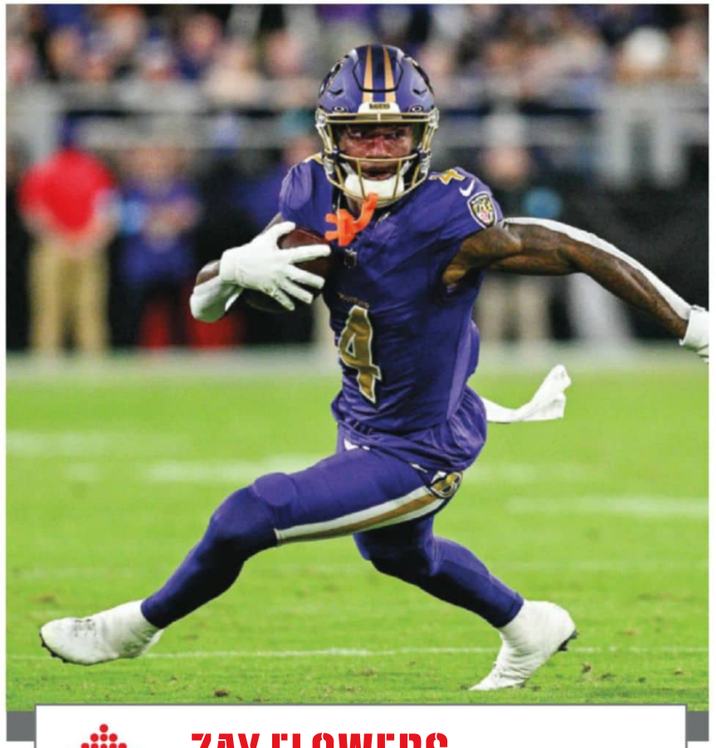
After five seasons in Minnesota and four in Buffalo, Diggs' first and only season with the Houston Texans ended when he suffered a torn ACL in Week 8. He finished the season with 47 catches for 496 yards and three touchdowns. Diggs, who will be 32 before the 2025 season is over, was not a hot commodity when free agency began. But he posted videos on social media chronicling his rehab, and the Patriots are confident he'll be ready to go in Week 1. Despite the age and potential decline, Diggs immediately becomes the Patriots' top receiving threat.

CHRISTIAN WATSON

WR | PACKERS

Green Bay's primary deep threat suffered a torn ACL in Week 18 of last season, and he is not expected to be ready for the start of the '25 season. "Obviously, Christian is going to miss some time, probably, at the beginning, more than likely," said Packers general manager Brian Gutekunst. With speed being such a big part of Watson's game (he averaged 21.4 yards per catch last season), there's a good chance he will not be 100% in time to help fantasy managers this season.

CLOCKWISE FROM TOP: TOMMY GILLIGAN-IMAGN IMAGES; DENNY MEDLEY-USA TODAY SPORTS; GREGORY FISHER-IMAGN IMAGES



ZAY FLOWERS

WR | RAVENS

In his second NFL season, Flowers led the Ravens in receptions (74) and receiving yards (1,059), earning his first Pro Bowl nod. However, a knee injury suffered in the regular-season finale left Flowers inactive for Baltimore's two playoff games. Fortunately for Flowers and the Ravens, the injury was not considered major — in fact, head coach John Harbaugh was hoping for Flowers to play had his team reached the AFC title game. We'll never know for sure, but Flowers is expected to be 100% when training camp begins — and he's already been talking about how missing those playoff games will serve as motivation for his return.

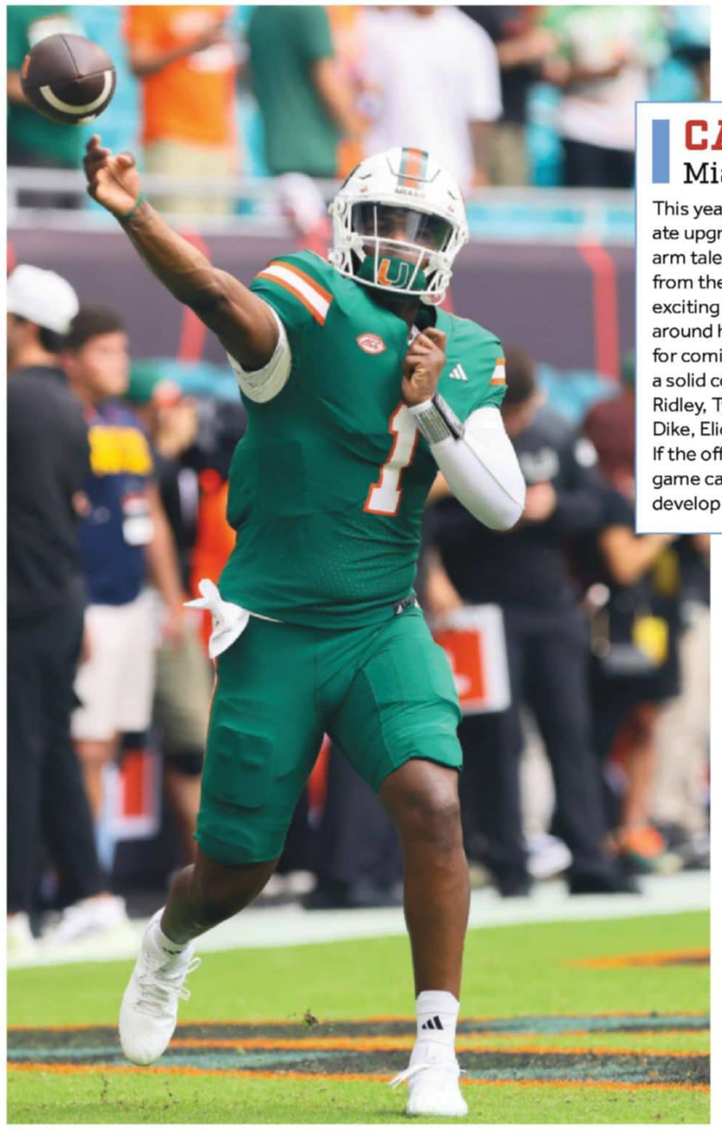
RASHEE RICE

WR | CHIEFS

After a successful rookie season in 2023 that culminated with a touchdown catch in Super Bowl LVIII, Rice suffered a season-ending knee injury in Week 4 of last season. His absence proved devastating for a Chiefs offense that was never the same, ultimately looking helpless in the Super Bowl LIX loss to the Philadelphia Eagles. Fortunately for the Chiefs, Rice started posting workout videos in March indicating that he is in good shape and ready to be a key contributor when the season begins (aside from the looming possibility of a suspension).

ROOKIE ROUNDUP

BY LUKE EASTERLING @LUKEEASTERLING



QUARTERBACKS

Miami (Fla.) | Titans

This year's No. 1 overall pick, Ward is an immediate upgrade over Will Levis. He's got impressive arm talent and smarts that make him effective from the pocket, as well as the ability to make exciting plays happen when things break down around him. He's a fierce competitor with a knack for coming through in the clutch, and he'll have a solid combination of reliable veterans (Calvin Ridley, Tyler Lockett) and fellow rookies (Chimere Dike, Elic Ayomanor) to help him through the air. If the offensive line can hold up, and the ground game can keep things balanced, Ward should develop quickly into a high-flying passer.

JAXSON DART
Ole Miss | Giants

The Giants traded back into the first round to land Dart, but they're still hoping he doesn't have to see the field for a while. New York signed a pair of veterans this offseason in Russell Wilson and Jameis Winston to hold down the fort for now, with Dart as the long-term developmental project for head coach Brian Daboll. Dart has the physical tools to become a quality starter down the road, but unless things go terribly wrong for the Wilson/Winston combo, there's a good chance he doesn't see any meaningful snaps as a rookie.

SAM NAVARRO-IMAGN IMAGES

TYLER SHOUGH
Louisville | Saints

One of the most unique quarterbacks in this year's draft class, Shough will turn 26 in September. Multiple injuries derailed his college career during previous stops at Oregon and Texas Tech, but he was impressive when fully healthy at Louisville last year. The Saints spent a top-40 pick on him in hopes that he can give them a better long-term solution than Spencer Rattler, and Derek Carr's retirement might force him to start Week 1. Shough's got the experience and mental toughness to do it, but he'll have to prove he can avoid injury.

JALEN MILROE
Alabama | Seahawks

Sam Darnold is the unquestioned starter after signing as a free agent this offseason, but Milroe is an exciting long-term play for Seattle. Similar to Josh Allen coming out of college, Milroe has elite athleticism and explosiveness as a runner, as well as a rocket arm that just needs to be developed with better consistency, accuracy and decision-making. Even if Darnold stays healthy, Milroe's running ability should still get him on the field in certain situations as a rookie.

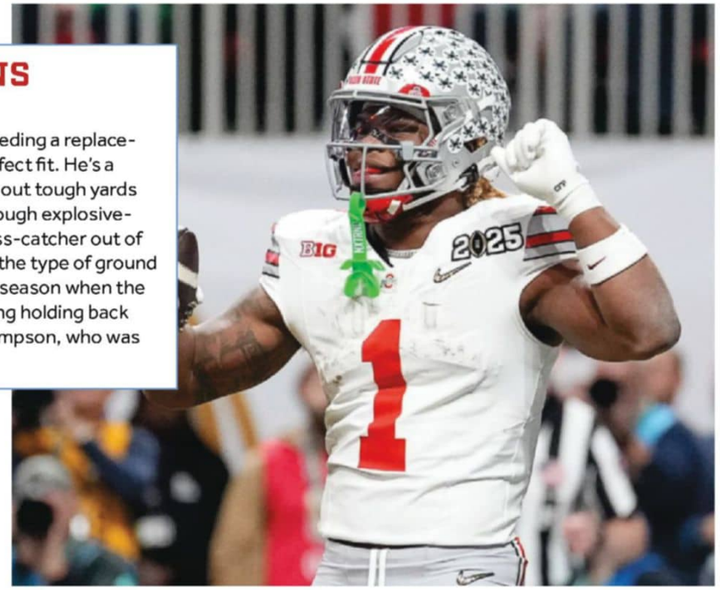
RUNNING BACKS

ASHTON JEANTY
Boise State | Raiders

The No. 6 overall pick in this year's draft, Jeanty is a rare talent in the same category as Saquon Barkley, Bijan Robinson and Jahmyr Gibbs. His fantasy value should match theirs, as Jeanty will immediately be the focal point of a Raiders offense that should see improved quarterback play from veteran addition Geno Smith. If the offensive line can be merely adequate, Jeanty's three-down playmaking ability and knack for shedding tackles and breaking off big runs should make him an instant fantasy superstar.

OMARION HAMPTON
North Carolina | Chargers

This year's other first-round running back, Hampton has the size and skill set to handle a full workload as both a runner and a receiver. Head coach Jim Harbaugh will always prioritize the ground game, and Hampton is expected to be his new bell-cow back. NFL teams don't spend first-round picks at this position unless they're prepared to give them plenty of touches, so expect Hampton to make an immediate and significant impact for both the Chargers and fantasy managers.



QUINSHON JUDKINS
Ohio State | Browns

The Browns came into this year's draft needing a replacement for Nick Chubb, and Judkins is a perfect fit. He's a compact, powerful runner who can churn out tough yards between the tackles, but he's also got enough explosiveness to create big plays. He's a decent pass-catcher out of the backfield, and he's built to spearhead the type of ground game that can still be effective late in the season when the weather gets cold and nasty. The only thing holding back his fantasy value is fellow rookie Dylan Sampson, who was picked two rounds later.

TREVEYON HENDERSON
Ohio State | Patriots

New England already had a solid RB1 in Rhamondre Stevenson, but that didn't stop them from adding more juice and upside in the second round of this year's draft with Henderson. A versatile runner who has the explosiveness to score on every touch, Henderson brings speed and big-play potential to the Pats' ground game, and his combination of receiving skills and pass-blocking prowess will get him a ton of third-down action.

RJ HARVEY
UCF | Broncos

We all knew that the Broncos needed an upgrade in their backfield, and at the end of the second round, they picked Harvey to provide that upgrade. He was one of the more underrated backs throughout the pre-draft process, as his film shows a well-rounded runner with enough speed and power to win in multiple ways, and the combination of vision and patience to excel in any scheme. He should be the early favorite to command the lion's share of the touches in Denver.

KALEB JOHNSON
Iowa | Steelers

After moving on from Najee Harris, the Steelers needed to add some power back to their ground game to go along with change-of-pace back Jaylen Warren. Johnson fits the bill perfectly and was a solid value pick for them in the third round. He's a strong, downhill runner who can build up a head of steam and punish would-be tacklers at the point of attack, and he's got the ideal frame and skill set to assume the early-down role right away.

BHAYSHUL TUTEN
Virginia Tech | Jaguars

Yes, the Jags already have a decent running back tandem in Travis Etienne Jr. and Tank Bigsby, but their backfield still needed more juice. Tuten is just the man for the job, with elite straight-line speed and the toughness to run through contact in the trenches. Ball security has been an issue, but if he can keep that under control, Tuten has the skill set to potentially become first-year head coach Liam Coen's new version of Tampa Bay's Bucky Irving in Jacksonville.

CAM SKATTEBO
Arizona State | Giants

This was an ideal landing spot for Skattebo, who brings the thunder to perfectly pair with the lightning the Giants already have with Tyrone Tracy Jr. in the backfield. Tracy's elusiveness and pass-catching skills make him an ideal third-down back and change-of-pace runner, while Skattebo's size and strength should make him the more attractive and effective option on early downs and in short-yardage/goal-line situations.

TREVOR ETIENNE
Georgia | Panthers

A shifty, compact runner with decent speed, Etienne makes up for his lack of ideal size with impressive toughness for a smaller, lighter back. He's talented, but he joins a Carolina backfield that just gave veteran starter Chuba Hubbard a hefty contract extension and has Rico Dowdle, so he might not have a clear path to significant snaps.

WOODY MARKS
USC | Texans

Joe Mixon is still one of the best three-down backs in the league, but he'll turn 29 this summer, and Houston clearly wanted an understudy. Marks isn't the biggest or fastest runner, but he's elusive in the open field, and he has the vision/patience combo to set up his blocks and pick up big chunks of yardage. He should challenge for the backup job behind Mixon right away, with long-term starter upside.

KIRBY LEE-IMAGN IMAGES

TRAVIS HUNTER
Colorado | Jaguars

It remains to be seen what Hunter's exact workload will be at the next level, but it's safe to say this two-way star will spend plenty of time on offense. He'll have a talented quarterback in Trevor Lawrence and another explosive playmaker in Brian Thomas Jr. lined up opposite him, which should give Hunter plenty of opportunities to find open space and make the most of his chances to put up fantasy points as an offensive weapon.

TETAIROA McMILLAN
Arizona | Panthers

The Panthers are tired of having to cover Mike Evans and Drake London twice a year, so they went out and got their own massive pass-catcher in McMillan. He's closer to London's more finesse skill set than Evans' physicality, but McMillan's towering frame, huge catch radius and impressive athleticism should quickly make him Bryce Young's go-to target, especially in the red zone.

EMEKA EGBUKA
Ohio State | Buccaneers

Perhaps the most polished and pro-ready player in the entire draft, Egbuka lands in a curious spot in Tampa Bay, where they don't need him to make a massive impact right away. The Bucs already have one of the league's best 1-2 punches in Mike Evans and Chris Godwin, but Egbuka's route-running ability, sure hands and versatility should still get him on the field early and often. He'll team up with 2024 rookie sensation Jalen McMillan to give Tampa Bay another talented tandem for years to come.

CLOCKWISE FROM TOP LEFT: CHRISTOPHER HANEWINCKEL-IMAGN IMAGES; ADAM CAIRNS/COLUMBUS DISPATCH; MARK J. REBILAS-IMAGN IMAGES; SARA DIGGINS/AMERICAN-STATESMAN

MATTHEW GOLDEN
Texas | Packers

After two decades of waiting, Packers fans were finally treated to a first-round wide receiver in Golden, who brings elite speed and sharp route-running chops to Green Bay. His explosiveness and big-play potential should allow Golden to have an immediate impact despite other promising targets already on the roster, and Jordan Love's rare arm strength should make the most of Golden's ability to stretch defenses over the top.

JAYDEN HIGGINS
Iowa State | Texans

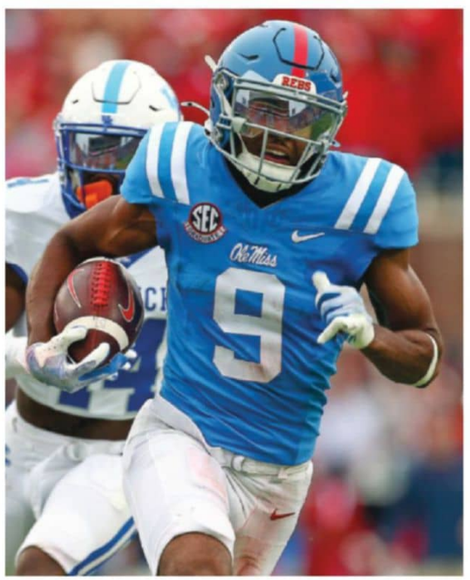
Season-ending injuries to both Tank Dell and Stefon Diggs left the Texans without much help for C.J. Stroud across from Nico Collins, but Higgins gives him another big, athletic target who can win at all levels of the field. He should be especially valuable in the red zone, as well as in any contested-catch situation, and Collins' presence should give Higgins plenty of 1-on-1 opportunities to exploit.

LUTHER BURDEN III
Missouri | Bears

Rome Odunze and DJ Moore already gave Caleb Williams a talented pass-catching pair, but the addition of Burden gives new head coach Ben Johnson a whole new wrinkle for his innovative offense. Burden's explosiveness and toughness make him a nightmare for opposing defenses after the catch, and you can bet Johnson will find plenty of creative ways to get him the ball early and often.

TRE HARRIS
Ole Miss | Chargers

Ladd McConkey made a huge impact as a rookie last season, but Justin Herbert still needed a reliable downfield threat with size and strength who can challenge opposing defenses with the deep ball. Harris is an ideal fit, with a big frame and the ability to take the top off the defense with his speed. McConkey is still likely to see more targets, but Harris should provide plenty of big plays right away.



JACK BECH
TCU | Raiders

Brock Bowers obviously will remain the primary target for new quarterback Geno Smith in Vegas, but there's still plenty of room for a secondary option to acquire some volume in this passing game. Bech is a versatile playmaker with a big, solid frame and reliable hands that play well through contact at the catch point. He's got an opportunity to carve out a significant role right away as a big slot option who can move the chains and score points in the red zone.

KYLE WILLIAMS
Washington State | Patriots

One of the best value picks in this year's draft, Williams is one of the most lethal downfield weapons in the class, making up for his lack of size and physicality with elite explosiveness and sharp route-running ability. He should quickly develop a rapport with Drake Maye in New England, and his big-play potential as a deep threat should be taken advantage of early and often in a passing attack that lacks a clear-cut top target.

ISAAC TESLAA
Arkansas | Lions

A surprise selection on Day 2, TeSlaa has good size and the ability to win in contested-catch situations against smaller defenders. He's a solid route-runner and a reliable target in the intermediate areas of the field, but he could struggle to make a big impact right away for a team that already has primary targets in Amon-Ra St. Brown and Sam LaPorta, as well as a dynamic deep threat in Jameson Williams.

PAT BRYANT
Illinois | Broncos

Bo Nix already has a handful of trustworthy targets at his disposal, but Bryant has the size and well-rounded skill set to push for some snaps as he starts to digest Sean Payton's offense. He could eventually carve out a starting role, but it'll be a challenge in the short term to supplant Courtland Sutton, Marvin Mims Jr. and last season's rookie revelation Devaughn Vele.

JAYLIN NOEL
Iowa State | Texans

Houston decided to keep a good thing going and make sure Noel and Jayden Higgins remained teammates at the pro level, too. While Higgins brings size and physicality to the table, Noel is the undersized but explosive deep threat and after-the-catch weapon who was dangerous on every touch for the Cyclones. It'll be tough for him to get on the field when all of C.J. Stroud's top targets are healthy, but Noel is a legit playmaker with too much upside to keep on the sidelines.

SAVION WILLIAMS
TCU | Packers

Green Bay double-dipped at receiver in the first three rounds, following first-round pick Matthew Golden with Williams in the third round. A converted high school quarterback, Williams has a massive frame and game-breaking speed that give him limitless potential at the next level, but he needs a ton of refinement as a route-runner before he's ready to be a full-time starter. He should still see some schemed touches as both a wideout and coming out of the backfield right away, though.

TAI FELTON
Maryland | Vikings

Minnesota already has a dynamic pass-catching trio of Justin Jefferson, Jordan Addison and T.J. Hockenson, but Felton should compete right away with incumbent Jalen Nailor for the WR3 job. Nailor had his moments last season when injuries cropped up, but Felton has the size, athleticism and explosiveness to create the kinds of big plays that could set him apart in the position battle.

CHIMERE DIKE
Florida | Titans

Dike impressed at this year's NFL Scouting Combine with his combination of size and speed, and he's got the talent to be a much more productive pro than he was in college. No. 1 overall pick Cam Ward has some veteran options who will take priority early, but Dike's upside could mean he eventually becomes Ward's go-to target in the future.

JUNFU HAN

COLSTON LOVELAND
Michigan | Bears

Loveland's size and athleticism should be put to good use in Ben Johnson's new offense in Chicago, but he could suffer from too many mouths to feed in the passing game. With a receiver trio that features DJ Moore, 2024 top-10 pick Rome Odunze and fellow rookie Luther Burden III, Loveland might not see a ton of volume, but he'll still be a difference-maker when the ball comes his way.

TYLER WARREN
Penn State | Colts

Warren's massive frame, well-rounded skill set and effectiveness as a blocker make him an ideal fit for Indy's run-first offense, but that won't help his fantasy upside. Neither will the Colts' uninspiring quarterback situation, but Warren is still a versatile, dynamic weapon through the air, and he should command plenty of red-zone targets and creatively schemed touches from head coach Shane Steichen's system.

MASON TAYLOR
LSU | Jets

The son and nephew of two Hall of Fame Miami Dolphins (his dad is Jason Taylor and his uncle is Zach Thomas), Taylor will forge his own NFL path with an AFC East rival. He's got the best set of hands in this year's tight end class at his disposal, as well as the size and complete skill set to line up anywhere on the field. He should quickly become a favorite target of Justin Fields in New York, and a go-to weapon in critical situations.

TERRANCE FERGUSON
Oregon | Rams

Sean McVay loves a big, athletic tight end with alignment versatility and playmaking upside, so it made total sense when Ferguson was the Rams' top draft pick this year. He can create mismatches against smaller defensive backs and less athletic back-seven defenders, and he could quickly push Tyler Higbee for a significant role in the passing game.

ELIJAH ARROYO
Miami (Fla.) | Seahawks

The Seattle offense saw plenty of turnover this offseason, so it's anyone's guess who will be the quickest to develop a consistent connection and trust with new quarterback Sam Darnold. While opposing defenses work to stop Jaxon Smith-Njigba and Cooper Kupp, Arroyo could find plenty of 1-on-1 situations to exploit as an athletic playmaker who can challenge all levels of the field.

FAMILIAR FACES NEW PLACES

BY KYLE WOOD

QUARTERBACKS

SEAHAWKS

Darnold had a career year in Minnesota, finishing fifth in both passing yards (4,319) and touchdowns (35) before he reverted back to his old self in Week 18 and in the wild-card loss. That poor finish likely cost Darnold a good deal of money on the open market, but he still landed in Seattle on a three-year deal. The question is just how much credit the Vikings' infrastructure deserves for Darnold's renaissance and whether he can replicate it with the Seahawks.

Impact: Darnold is coming off a QB1 finish, but expectations should be tempered without Justin Jefferson and Jordan Addison to throw to and with someone other than Kevin O'Connell calling the shots. Geno Smith laid the blueprint for success in Seattle with a top-five QB finish, though that was before DK Metcalf was traded. With Jaxon Smith-Njigba and Cooper Kupp in the fold, Darnold slots in as a QB2.

JUSTIN FIELDS
JETS

The Steelers were successful starting Fields at quarterback for the first third of the season before pivoting to Russell Wilson. Fields' numbers didn't jump off the page, but he did throw for 300 yards in a game for just the second time in his career, and his rushing production gives him a high floor. Now on his third team, he'll need to continue running at a high level in New York to provide similar fantasy value to his sophomore season in Chicago when he was a QB1. The 26-year-old dual-threat is a sea change from 41-year-old Aaron Rodgers.

Impact: Fields offers QB1 upside late in drafts for managers who want to wait on the position. However, his play week-to-week might be hard to rely on if he does not progress as a passer in New York. Fields has never thrown for 3,000 yards or 20 touchdowns in a season.

GENO SMITH RAIDERS

Smith was one of six quarterbacks to throw for 4,000 yards last season and one of five to complete at least 70% of his pass attempts. However, he threw 15 interceptions — his most since his rookie year — in an up-and-down season with the Seahawks. The trade to the Raiders reunites Smith with head coach Pete Carroll, and it could be a boon for his late-career fantasy prospects. Las Vegas hired former Ohio State offensive coordinator Chip Kelly, and Brock Bowers emerged as one of the top tight ends in the NFL as a rookie. The offensive line is by no means elite, but it's an upgrade from the situation in Seattle.

Impact: Smith slots in as a QB2 with weekly upside. He immediately becomes the best quarterback Las Vegas has had since early-career Derek Carr. Smith also raises the ceiling and floor of Bowers, who set records in spite of patchwork play under center.

RUSSELL WILSON
GIANTS

Despite the public perception of Wilson since his last season in Seattle, his statistical output has been better than expected over the last four years. He showed brief flashes of his old self last season in Pittsburgh with a 400-yard game, and he occasionally made plays with his legs. Landing in New York, where Malik Nabers is the only viable receiving option, isn't a huge upgrade for Wilson — though it should help Nabers. If Wilson flames out, the G-Men also signed Jameis Winston and drafted Jaxson Dart in Round 1.

Impact: Wilson will be no more than an occasional streaming option. His decline in rushing production as he moves into his late 30s mixed with the Giants' well-documented offensive woes puts a hard cap on his fantasy value.

AARON RODGERS
FREE AGENT

Statistically, Rodgers' one healthy season with the Jets was his best since 2021. But the 41-year-old remains unsigned as of publication despite a long, public flirtation with the Steelers. It's hard to imagine Pittsburgh entering the 2025 campaign with a quarterback room of Mason Rudolph and Will Howard, but Kirk Cousins remains a potential option in the Steel City. Regardless of whether Rodgers retires, starts for the Steelers or signs elsewhere, his biggest impact as a fantasy asset will be for the weapons around him rather than as a standalone quarterback option.

RUNNING BACKS

TIM HEITMAN-IMAGN IMAGES

RICO DOWDLE
PANTHERS

Dowdle's fantasy production was serviceable in his lone season as the Cowboys' starter, though that was anchored by career-highs in rushes and receptions. There will be a cap on Dowdle's ceiling in Carolina as he fights for touches with Chuba Hubbard and rookie Trevor Etienne. Where Dowdle can set himself apart is as a receiving back, which would raise his floor a good deal if he can carve out a consistent role on third down.

Impact: It will be tough to count on Dowdle week-to-week for reliable fantasy production considering how many mouths there will be to feed. Another year of development for quarterback Bryce Young with head coach Dave Canales should help Carolina's overall offensive outlook, though.

BARRY REEGER-IMAGN IMAGES

NAJEE HARRIS
CHARGERS

The Bolts haven't had a 1,000-yard rusher since Melvin Gordon III in 2017. Harris has never run for fewer than 1,000 yards across his four seasons with the Steelers, during which he never missed a game. That streak might be in jeopardy this season — even in Jim Harbaugh's run-heavy offense — given the addition of Omarion Hampton in Round 1. Harris did largely hold off Jaylen Warren in Pittsburgh, but Los Angeles' investment in Hampton indicates the North Carolina product will be involved as a rookie.

Impact: Harris has finished no worse than RB20 in his career even as his touches and touchdowns have declined. Again, that might change this year if Hampton overtakes him. Where Harris can still make his hay is around the goal line, running behind a better offensive line in what should be a higher-scoring offense than he's accustomed to.

JORDAN MASON
VIKINGS

Given an opportunity to lead the 49ers backfield, Mason produced in a big way before a high-ankle injury ended his breakout year. Minnesota's decision to trade for and extend the 26-year-old back is encouraging for his short- and long-term prospects. Veteran Aaron Jones is still on the roster and coming off an 1,100-yard season, but he's on the wrong side of 30. There's room for Mason and Jones to both produce so long as J.J. McCarthy can support a competent offense in his first healthy NFL season.

Impact: Mason, who had three 100-yard games last season, has a chance to have some standalone value in 2025. Worst case, he's a high-upside handcuff for Jones — who always seems to miss a game or two — in an efficient offense.

JAVONTE WILLIAMS
COWBOYS

Dallas took a low-cost flyer on a player who hasn't performed at the same level for a sustained period since his 2022 knee injury. Williams split carries in his final season with the Broncos, and he had only three games with 10-plus PPR fantasy points on his way to another RB3 finish. There will be less competition for touches in Dallas, and Williams has shown himself to be a capable pass-catcher, but questions persist about just how good the Cowboys' offense will be.

Impact: Rico Dowdle put together a top-24 finish in 2024 in less than ideal conditions with Dak Prescott sidelined for much of the season. That's likely the high end of potential outcomes for Williams, who has never run for 1,000 yards in his career and isn't exactly a touchdown machine, either.

COREY PERRINE/FLORIDA TIMES-UNION

DAVANTE ADAMS
RAMS

Despite the dysfunction of the Raiders and Jets, Adams still turned in another 1,000-yard season and top-15 finish at age 32. Teaming up with Matthew Stafford and Sean McVay in Los Angeles, where defenses' attention may be more attuned to the younger Puka Nacua, could allow Adams to continue his near decade-long streak of top-24 finishes. Adams' 59 receiving touchdowns since 2020 are the most in the NFL.

Impact: When Cooper Kupp and Nacua shared the field, Stafford was able to support two fantasy-relevant receivers. There's no reason that shouldn't carry over to the Adams-Nacua pairing, especially considering Adams' affinity for the end zone. Expect WR2 production from Adams with occasional spike weeks.

DYAMI BROWN JAGUARS

Brown's first four years with the Commanders were largely disappointing, but he led the team in receiving during their march to the NFC title game. Jacksonville invested accordingly, taking a one-year flyer on Brown. He will now be lining up alongside Brian Thomas Jr. and No. 2 overall pick Travis Hunter. Still, there are targets to be had in this offense with Christian Kirk and Evan Engram out of the picture.

Impact: The Jaguars hired Liam Coen as head coach in hopes of elevating former No. 1 overall pick Trevor Lawrence. They also already have an alpha in BTJ and invested heavily to get Hunter, so Brown is no more than a complementary piece. Though three games is a small sample size compared to his four-year career, Brown's playoff run opposite Terry McLaurin showed proof of concept.

BRANDIN COOKS
SAINTS

Almost a decade later, Cooks returns to the Big Easy. However, the Saints' quarterback situation is a far cry from mid-2010s Drew Brees. Derek Carr's health is in question, the team took a second-round flyer on Tyler Shough and Spencer Rattler is still in the mix. Cooks will slot in behind Chris Olave, Rashid Shaheed and maybe even Juwan Johnson in the pecking order. Though he's a consummate pro, Cooks' best fantasy days might be behind him.

Impact: Even if New Orleans' quarterback situation turns out better than expected, it's difficult to envision Cooks' being the big beneficiary of a resurgent year from Carr or a breakout from Shough or Rattler. The best bet for Cooks to maintain relevance is touchdown production, which is difficult to count on week-to-week.

STEFON DIGGS
PATRIOTS

Tight end Hunter Henry led New England in receiving last season with 674 yards. Diggs had 496 yards in eight games in 2024 before he went down with an ACL tear. Even though he's on the wrong side of 30 and coming off a knee injury, Diggs will easily be up-and-coming quarterback Drake Maye's best option. He's a veteran who knows how to get open, and he could be a target machine next season for the Pats.

Impact: New England hasn't had a 1,000-yard receiver since Julian Edelman in 2019. Diggs — who saw his run of six straight 1,000-yard seasons end last year — might not be the one to end that drought, but he will help raise the floor of what was a moribund offense a season ago. Touchdowns could be tough to come by, but sheer volume might make Diggs an interesting dart throw.

NEW

PATRIOTS

Hollins' arrival in Foxborough gives Maye a big-bodied red-zone target, but the journeyman isn't likely to see a ton of targets considering the role he'll have in New England's offense. Stefon Diggs, DeMario Douglas and Kayshon Boutte are all likely ahead of Hollins in the pecking order, and that's not to mention third-round draft pick Kyle Williams.

Impact: Hollins will continue to be a touchdown-dependent dart throw, and he's moving to a lesser offense. He could occasionally provide value in DFS leagues, but he doesn't move the needle in redraft.

DEANDRE HOPKINS
RAVENS

It feels like we've seen this movie before with Dez Bryant, DeSean Jackson and Odell Beckham Jr. among Baltimore's past veteran wide receiver signings. Will Hopkins be any different? He finished tied for third on the Chiefs last season with 437 receiving yards across 10 games — and he was largely a nonfactor in the postseason. Zay Flowers, Mark Andrews and maybe even Rashod Bateman and Isaiah Likely figure to command more targets from Lamar Jackson.

Impact: Hopkins has just one top-24 finish under his belt over the last four seasons. This was a low-cost investment for the Ravens, but it doesn't move the needle from a fantasy perspective, especially considering how many options there are in a run-heavy offense.

CHRISTIAN KIRK

There's room for Kirk to carve out a role in Houston with defenses narrowed in on Nico Collins. Stefon Diggs and Tank Dell — who figures to miss most of or all of the 2025 season — both found ways to produce despite the high number of targets that get funneled to Collins. Kirk's final year in Jacksonville, which ended after eight games due to a fractured collarbone, was not his best. However, he's just two years removed from a career-best top-12 finish as he enters his age-29 season.

Impact: Kirk will have to hold off second- and third-round picks Jayden Higgins and Jaylin Noel to remain relevant. The change of scenery could allow the slot receiver to recoup some of his value as an occasional flex play. And if quarterback C.J. Stroud bounces back to how he performed as a rookie, the Texans' offense could take a leap overall.

COOPER KUPP
SEAHAWKS

Kupp has been frustrating for fantasy managers since his triple crown season in 2021. He's largely produced at a high level since then, yet he's missed 18 games over the last three years. Counting on him to play a full season in his age-32 campaign doesn't seem like a good bet. Kupp has dealt with target competition the last two years alongside Nacua, so sharing the workload with Jaxon Smith-Njigba isn't a big shift. However, there's also the matter of the quarterback and play-caller downgrade from Matthew Stafford and Sean McVay to Sam Darnold and Klint Kubiak.

Impact: Kupp will continue to command targets, get open and, yes, score touchdowns. Just don't expect a WR1 or even WR2 campaign. His range of outcomes is more in WR3 range. Temper your expectations, but also don't be surprised if there are WR1-caliber outings here and there..

MARK J. REBILAS-IMAGN IMAGES

DK METCALF
STEELERS

Metcalf hasn't had a top-12 finish since 2021, and now he's walking into an uncertain quarterback situation in Pittsburgh. If Aaron Rodgers ends up in a Steelers uniform, that could bode well for the big-bodied Metcalf. But if Mason Rudolph or rookie Will Howard starts, it's hard to see Metcalf's fantasy output exceeding what he's done the last few seasons with Geno Smith under center in Seattle. Pittsburgh believed in him enough to sign him to a five-year, $150 million deal, and he'll have plenty of opportunity with George Pickens off to Dallas.

Impact: A player of Metcalf's size, athleticism and talent always has WR1 upside, but the combination of his recent underwhelming production and the Steelers' questionable quarterback room lowers his floor. Just given the volume Metcalf is set to see in this offense, he slots in as an inconsistent WR2 capable of spike weeks and disappointments.

JOSHUA PALMER
BILLS

Palmer has never finished as a top-36 wide receiver despite spending his entire career with Justin Herbert. Teaming up with Josh Allen is an upgrade, but the situation is hardly better with Khalil Shakir, Keon Coleman and Dalton Kincaid all jockeying for targets on an offense that likes to establish the run. Palmer could see an uptick in his touchdown output, as Allen threw three or more touchdowns to five different pass-catchers in 2024.

Impact: Palmer profiles as no more than an occasional flex play. Like Mack Hollins last season, a vertical threat who led the team in touchdowns, Palmer will be touchdown-dependent. The good thing is there's plenty of scores to go around in Buffalo.

GEORGE PICKENS
COWBOYS

Pickens' move to Dallas gives him an instant quarterback upgrade in Dak Prescott. However, he'll no longer be the No. 1 option in the offense like he was the last two seasons in Pittsburgh. CeeDee Lamb is a target monster, but the Cowboys figure to throw more often than the Steelers, so those realities should offset each other. Pickens' ability is undeniable, but his inconsistency is frustrating. The former second-round pick has yet to post a top-24 finish. Perhaps this is the year he puts it together with Prescott.

Impact: Fantasy managers can expect WR3 output from Pickens, which is more or less in line with what he's demonstrated so far in his career. The situation in Dallas is undeniably better than what Pickens is used to, but he's also never had more than five touchdowns in a season. He's best seen as a flex option.

DEEBO SAMUEL COMMANDERS

Like most of the 49ers' skill-position players in 2024, Samuel struggled to stay healthy. The result was a WR44 finish, his worst fantasy campaign since 2020. Moving on made sense for San Francisco, but it was also wise for a young Washington team to trade for a veteran WR2 to pair with Terry McLaurin. Samuel and McLaurin thrive in different areas of the field, so there's room for them both to succeed in Jayden Daniels' sophomore season.

Impact: Don't expect Samuel to return to his 2021 form, when he was a downfield threat with added value as a rusher. However, the Commanders clearly believe the 29-year-old has something left in the tank. Beyond trading for tackle Laremy Tunsil, the Samuel acquisition was their biggest offseason move on offense. With good health, Samuel could easily deliver on his relatively modest average draft position.

TIGHT ENDS

TYLER CONKLIN
CHARGERS

Conklin has put together four consecutive top-20 tight end finishes with 50-plus catches in each season, but he's never broken through for a top-12 finish. The move to L.A. doesn't figure to elevate his fantasy prospects all that much. The Chargers intend to run — a lot. Ladd McConkey is locked in as the top receiving target, and fellow tight end Will Dissly is back for another season with the Bolts. That caps Conklin's ceiling.

Impact: Justin Herbert has involved his tight ends a good deal in the past, so Conklin's ability to provide occasional streaming-level play primarily depends on his ability to surpass Dissly in the pecking order. It would also help for Herbert to see a touchdown spike reminiscent of his first two years in the league.

EVAN ENGRAM BRONCOS

Engram emerged as a target machine across three seasons in Jacksonville. His move to Denver shouldn't change that much considering head coach Sean Payton's track record with tight ends. Engram was a safety blanket for Trevor Lawrence with the Jaguars, and he can continue to do just that for Bo Nix as a complement to Courtland Sutton and Marvin Mims Jr.

Impact: Injuries hampered Engram's 2024 campaign, but he produced when he was on the field with four-plus catches in all but one game. The Broncos' pass rate could also see an uptick, which means more looks for Engram. He should be seen as a low-end TE1 who can overdeliver on his draft cost.

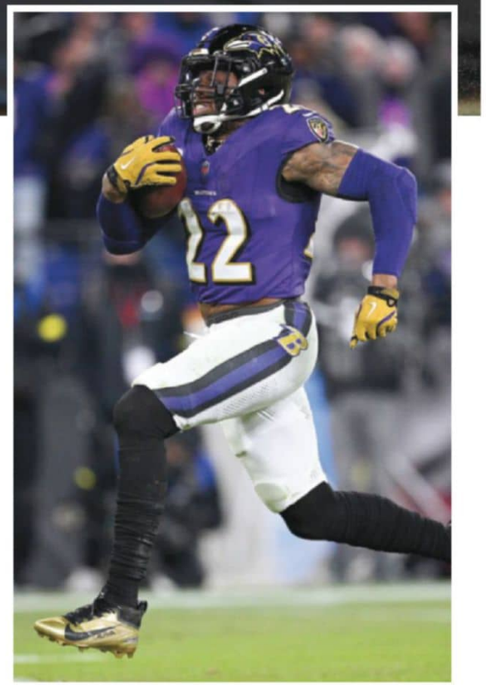
10 THINGS WE LEARNED ABOUT FANTASY FOOTBALL IN 2024 • BY RIVERS McCOWN

SAQUON BARKLEY AND DERRICK HENRY SHOWED THE CEILING OF PAIRING AN ELITE RB WITH AN ELITE QB

We've had plenty of elite rushing quarterback seasons, but rarely has a potential Hall of Fame running back talent been added to an offense with an elite running quarterback over the past 25 years. What we've seen are good backs paired with great running quarterbacks: Cam Newton had Jonathan Stewart and DeAngelo Williams, Michael Vick had Warrick Dunn, Justin Fields had David Montgomery, and so on. But it is hard to find something like the former No. 2 overall pick being paired with Jalen Hurts or a future Hall of Famer joining Lamar Jackson.

And it played out in an unprecedented way. All four players finished as top-11 scorers over the 18-week season, with Barkley and Henry finishing 1-2 at running back in average points per game and Hurts finishing sixth among quarterbacks while Jackson led the league.

It's tempting to say that this can't happen again, and betting on regression will always be a winning wager over the long term. But I don't know that my takeaway from the 2024 season is that we should be fading this. If anything, I'm closer to believing that we're undervaluing them in 2025 based on the projected regression.



FROM TOP: KATIE STRATMAN-IMAGN IMAGES; TOMMY GILLIGAN-IMAGN IMAGES

MARVIN HARRISON JR. WAS A CAUTIONARY TALE ABOUT BELIEVING TOO MUCH IN ROOKIE WIDE RECEIVERS

It's not that Harrison wound up being a bad fantasy football player in 2024. His average score over the season in PPR formats put him at WR41. He was certainly usable. But you didn't pay for usable; you paid for an off-the-shelf star, as he was lifted to the back of the first round in some cases and was otherwise an easy second-rounder.

Over the past few years, we've been blessed with some truly special WR classes — Malik Nabers finished 11th in average PPR PPG in 2024, Puka Nacua finished ninth in 2023 and Justin Jefferson finished ninth in 2020. The fact that this is the best that has been done recently is a reason why it's hard to believe strongly enough in a rookie wideout to draft him in the first two rounds.

One day, there will be a special wideout who finishes in the top five in the league as a rookie. (I don't think he's in the 2025 rookie class, but he might be Ohio State's Jeremiah Smith in 2027.) There will always be exceptions. But if we're making bets over the long haul, it's hard to believe in any wideout strongly enough to make a top-20 ADP out of him before we even know how he looks in his new offense.

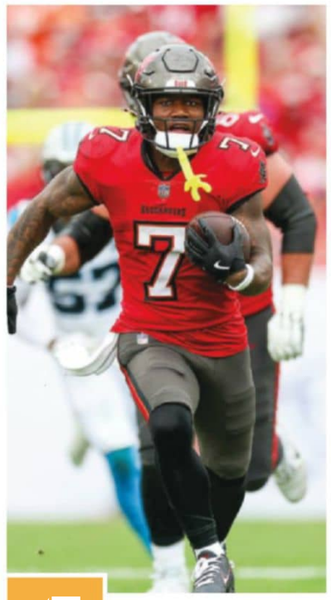
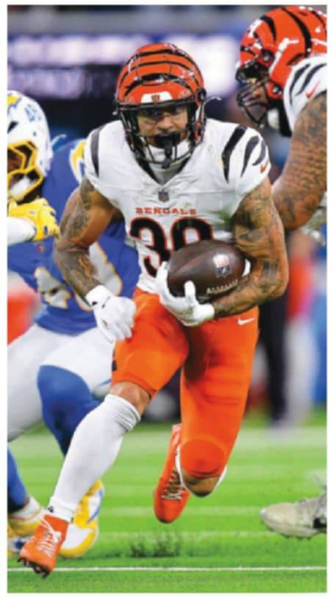
IT'S HARD TO THREAD THE NEEDLE BETWEEN BEING A POTENTIAL FANTASY WINNER AND COMING INTO THE YEAR HURT

Let's put aside Christian McCaffrey — I know, you drafted him, and I'm sorry — and talk about players who came into the year hurt, and we actually understood them to be hurt. It's a list that is headlined by Jonathon Brooks. We also had Nick Chubb, T.J. Hockenson, Hollywood Brown, Keaton Mitchell and Kendre Miller.

The strongest 2024 season on this list belonged to Hockenson, and you essentially had to wait 10 weeks for him to deliver a plausible TE1 line. Brooks got absolutely engulfed by Chuba Hubbard's breakout and then got hurt again. Chubb offered two fantasy games with more than 10 PPR points. Mitchell and Miller were non-factors all season. Brown didn't play until Week 16.

I'm normally hesitant with guys who have lingering injuries anyway — and you'll notice I kept some of them who could have reinforced my point out of that last list. But I think there's a good case to be made that if a player is known to be missing time coming into the year, he should be faded even harder than consensus. Missing practice time gets a player in a questionable spot with the coaching staff, and then, even when the player does come back, we have to play a guessing game as to how healthy he is and how involved he'll be. Do you really want to bank on Brandon Aiyuk being more valuable in 2025 than an average eighth-round pick? I don't think the odds are in favor of your winning that bet.





4 THE YOUNG RUNNING BACK IN THE ROOM WILL SOMETIMES NEED MORE THAN FOUR WEEKS TO ESTABLISH HIMSELF

A common lament I had last year was that I gave up on my young running backs too soon. So after Rico Dowdle ended Week 3 with three straight games of fewer than six fantasy points, I thought about dropping him. But I remembered dropping De'Von Achane after his first two games in 2023. And I held.

Bucky Irving finished with one game of more than 10 fantasy points in his first five. Chase Brown had three duds to start the year, with a high of 6.9 fantasy points. Tyrone Tracy Jr. was a complete non-factor early in the season.

Every one of those backs would finish the year in the top 31 in average fantasy points per game and in the top 26 in total scoring in PPR formats. "Rookies perform better down the stretch" is a little too obvious of a lesson at this point, and two of these guys weren't even rookies. Instead, I think coaches lean on veterans early in the season. And we should understand that and hold on to our young backs — especially if the veterans' performances aren't overwhelming. That chance may yet be coming, especially if the back is already garnering playing time. With how deep the 2025 rookie running back class looks right now, I want you to put away the panic button until we're in October. Promise me.

5 ISAIAH LIKELY WAS A FINE WEEK 1 WAIVER BUDGET-BUSTER

I think the process behind spending over half of your waiver budget on Likely in Week 1 was good, if you did it. Yes, even knowing how it ended. In 2023, the huge Week 1 waiver wire doorbusters were Puka Nacua and Kyren Williams. Nobody who claimed them and paid the price felt bad about it.

The Ravens weren't exactly offering tons of praise for Likely or conveying concrete ideas about getting Mark Andrews involved, and Andrews is entering the end of his prime years. He was nursing an ankle injury all offseason. Given how weak the tight end position was, it would be bad form to ignore Likely's first game and move on. And there were several other breaks that you could have caught to make Likely work out for you — a Zay Flowers injury, or both Likely and Andrews finding major roles in the offense.

It didn't play out that way, but I think it was a good bet to believe in what Likely put out there in Week 1. And if you see another major outlier performance in Week 1 this year, I wouldn't be scared to bet on it again.

6 JAYDEN DANIELS WAS THE PERFECT LATE-ROUND QUARTERBACK PICK, AND WE SHOULD LOOK OUT FOR JUSTIN FIELDS, JALEN MILROE AND ANTHONY RICHARDSON (YES, AGAIN) IN THE SAME WAY

What separated Daniels from the field at quarterback wasn't his talent but the asking price to buy in on it. Even after buzz started to develop around his running game late in training camp, Daniels was going off the board after the first 100 picks. Daniels would eventually go on to make his ADP look extremely stupid by also being better than expected as a passer. But it was the rushing upside that made him a powerful fantasy football threat.

I look at Fields with a quarterback room where he's easily the No. 1 guy, and I look at his 2022 season — the one where he rushed for 1,143 yards — and I think "hmm." Then I look at his ADP and think this is a situation that's ripe for the picking. Richardson also has the post-hype sleeper feel after two bad seasons, but there are more question marks about his job security.

Finally, if Milroe were to be pressed into action by a Sam Darnold injury, I think the Fields scenario would be very much in play for him. He rushed for 20 touchdowns in 2024 for Alabama, to go along with 726 rushing yards. There's a strong chance he can become the NFL's next great running quarterback.

Fields' failure as a fantasy quarterback in 2023, along with Trey Lance's in 2022, soured the whole industry on the concept of an upside running quarterback because we had to question if these quarterbacks were good enough at actually playing the position to keep their jobs. Daniels' success will probably pull some players back to the table, but Fields' and Richardson's early failures should keep them downgraded enough to be potential values in 2025.

IF A TEAM CAN'T CORRECT SOMETHING IN A FEW WEEKS, RARELY WILL THAT TEAM ACTUALLY CORRECT IT OVER THE REST OF THE SEASON

In Week 5, the Jets went to London to play the Vikings. What we had learned at that point was that the Jets refused to run the ball, and that Aaron Rodgers wasn't going to do anything but what he was comfortable with.

In Week 3, the Texans took on the Vikings. What we learned that day was that Houston's protection scheme was so elementary that anybody could solve it.

Over the rest of the season, no matter what changes were made — for the Jets it was almost an entire coaching staff, and for the Texans, their best receivers shuffled in and out of the lineup while their line combinations were frequently overhauled — neither of these teams could advance beyond that early read. The Packers did the same thing to the Texans in Week 6. The Jets pathologically refused to run the ball or get Garrett Wilson involved. In fact, they traded for Davante Adams to avoid getting Wilson the ball.

It's one thing to approach these situations with fresh eyes in 2025, and I'm certainly open to the idea of the Jets and Texans delivering fantasy value this season. But once we saw how easily they were handled and how stubbornly they refused to change in response to that, it was time to fully fade them. Nobody who kept starting C.J. Stroud, Rodgers or Breece Hall against the wind in 2024 was happy. There was no upside to tap; just pain. This is both a PSA for managers stuck with players in a situation like this and managers who might look to buy on a team struggling in a similar way in 2025: If the team can't fix something quickly, there's no reason you should be buying the idea that they'll do it over the rest of the season.

EVERY EIGHT YEARS OR SO, SOMEONE WILL DRAFT A FIRST-ROUND GRENADE — MAKE IT A PRIORITY TO GRAB THE BACKUP RUNNING BACK IF THERE ARE ANY QUESTION MARKS

I was not a Christian McCaffrey drafter in any of my main leagues last year, but I was a McCaffrey beneficiary. I snagged Jordan Mason off the waiver wire in probably half my leagues and was able to ride his strong first half while my rookie backs developed.

It's very rare we have a situation develop like McCaffrey's — the only other time I can remember it in the past 15 years is when Le'Veon Bell actually held true to his holdout with the Steelers in 2018. What happened that year was: James Conner delivered excellent production with 13 total touchdowns and 71 catches, finishing with the sixth-most fantasy points among running backs in PPR leagues.

I don't think there was a bad thought process to the McCaffrey pick at first overall, if you made it. You simply got spiked by something nobody — perhaps not even the 49ers — saw coming. But the lesson to take away from it is that you can recoup some of the running back value by making sure you grab the backup. And when you draft a running back in the first round, and you have any doubt that said running back will be available, you should probably invest heavily in his backup. Wide receivers? Quarterbacks? If they blow up, you don't have anywhere to turn. Running backs? You have a volume-based out. Use it.

THE CHIEFS ARE GOING TO REMAIN AN ANNOYING EXCEPTION FOR AS LONG AS THEIR CURRENT COACHING PHILOSOPHY STANDS

All last offseason, we were subjected to the hype about the Chiefs becoming an offensive juggernaut again. Patrick Mahomes was elevated to a top-three quarterback in ADP despite coming off a season in which he finished eighth in QB fantasy scoring. Xavier Worthy would open up the middle of the field with his deep jets, Rashee Rice and Hollywood Brown were going to feast and the offense would go back to stratospheric levels.

Instead, Mahomes finished 12th at his position in scoring. Rice and Brown missed most of the season. Worthy was an extremely unreliable deep receiver, though he did blossom down the stretch when they made him more of a part of the underneath game.

I don't think the Chiefs are necessarily going to be that bad again, but I think it's fair to question just how much they worry about regular-season games at this point. Moreover, now that Rice and Worthy are both projecting to be healthy and back (although Rice might be facing a suspension), I think we might get another scenario where nobody comes out of training camp as a true alpha receiver.

I like the players in the room, but ultimately it's hard to justify believing in any Chiefs player as a top-50 selection. None of the offensive management has changed, Travis Kelce is another year older and they seem more interested in outlasting opponents in close games than really putting the throttle down during the regular season. It's just not an exciting fantasy football situation.

THE LEAGUE HAS DEMANDED MORE OF RUNNING BACKS, AND SO THEIR FANTASY VALUE AS A WHOLE IS GOING UP AFTER YEARS OF ZERO RB MANIFESTO

The two-high safety revolution has been fought, and the NFL industry is in the middle of adjusting to it. With more coverage players per snap, fantasy football has been dragged by real football, kicking and screaming, towards running backs. In 2021, there were three running backs among the top-30 PPR scorers. In 2023, there were six. And in 2024, there were nine, including four in the top 10.

I don't think this is a major change to the way we should view life for running backs or wide receivers. I do think it puts more emphasis on finding the backs who have all the right traits: clear lead back, in a good offense, an offense that clearly wants to run with talent that is above-average.

Zero RB will never be dead as long as you can hit on a few surprise picks and find a top-30 back among them, but I do think the grounds on which the strategy was built are shifting. I'd recommend a Hero RB — one highly drafted back — approach over a Zero RB approach at this point. You can give up some ground at running back, but you can't give up all of the upside. As it stands, the upside goes too high.

BEST AND WORST LANDING SPOTS FOR HIGH-PROFILE ROOKIES

BEST

RB, BRONCOS

Denver was expected to target a three-down back early in this draft, and they got their man in the second round with Harvey, who put up big numbers at UCF. He lands in a Broncos backfield that has a solid group of role players but is begging for a true featured back to take control of the workload and deliver some consistent fantasy relevance. Harvey has the skills to be that guy.

MIKE WATTERS-IMAGN IMAGES

KYLE WILLIAMS
WR, PATRIOTS

The Pats invested multiple Day 2 picks in the receiver position last year but didn't get much out of Ja'Lynn Polk or Javon Baker in their rookie seasons. With new management in charge, it wouldn't be surprising to see Williams quickly jump them on the depth chart, as the third-rounder out of Washington State brings big-play explosiveness that could make him Drake Maye's favorite target in no time.

KALEB JOHNSON
RB, STEELERS

Jaylen Warren has been a solid change-of-pace back alongside Najee Harris in Pittsburgh over the past couple of seasons, but that's probably the ceiling for his role. Following Harris' departure in free agency, the Steelers spent a third-round pick on Johnson, who has the size, power and downhill burst to eat up the majority of the early-down carries, as well as short-yardage and goal-line duties.

JACK BECH
WR, RAIDERS

Brock Bowers will remain the top target in the Las Vegas passing game this season and beyond, but while the Raiders have some solid veterans in the receiver room, Bech has a prime opportunity to assert himself as the No. 2 option in the pecking order. Geno Smith will be a massive upgrade at QB, and Bech could find plenty of space to work while opposing defenses are busy trying to slow down Bowers.

WORST

RB, BROWNS

Sampson's talent should have merited a Day 2 pick, and he could have landed in a backfield that needed a three-down playmaker to handle a full workload. Instead, he wasn't even the first back the Browns selected in this draft, coming off the board two rounds after Cleveland picked Quinshon Judkins. He'll automatically take a back seat to Judkins, who is a more complete back and whose higher draft capital will likely give him a higher snap count.

BRIANNA PACIORKA/USA TODAY NETWORK VIA IMAGN IMAGES

FROM TOP: NIRMALENDU MAJUMDAR/AMES TRIBUNE; MATTHEW O'HAREN-IMAGN IMAGES; JUNFU HAN

JAYLIN NOEL
WR, TEXANS

Noel was a steal for the Texans in the third round, and he's got to be thrilled about joining fellow Iowa State receiver Jayden Higgins in Houston and catching passes from C.J. Stroud. That said, he'll face tough sledding when it comes to targets, especially once Tank Dell is back to full strength. Nico Collins remains the WR1, with Higgins and Dell (when healthy) likely to be on the field more than Noel.

TYLER WARREN
TE, COLTS

Warren was a fantastic pick for the Colts, but for fantasy managers, it limits his scoring upside. Indy is a run-first offense built around Jonathan Taylor, and the quarterback situation is easily one of the worst in the league right now. Unless Anthony Richardson takes a massive leap in Year 3, or Daniel Jones takes his game to a level we've never seen, Warren might struggle to move the needle from a fantasy perspective.

COLSTON LOVELAND
TE, BEARS

Caleb Williams has to be thrilled with this pick, and Loveland will definitely be a valuable weapon in Ben Johnson's creative offense. That said, there are a ton of talented pass-catchers who will be fighting for target share, and even the veteran of the bunch (DJ Moore) is only 28. Rome Odunze and rookie second-round pick Luther Burden III will team up with Moore and Loveland to make Williams' life better, but Loveland's individual fantasy value might be limited.

2025 DYNASTY STASHES

BY LUKE EASTERLING

IT'S ALWAYS A GOOD IDEA TO SAVE UP FOR A RAINY DAY. HERE ARE SOME PLAYERS YOU SHOULD CONSIDER STASHING AWAY SHOULD THE NEED ARISE.

JA'LYNN POLK
WR, PATRIOTS

Polk's rookie season in New England was painfully forgettable, as the former Washington Husky caught 12 passes for only 87 yards, averaging a measly 7.3 yards per reception. He did find the end zone twice, but it was a terrible shock to see a top-40 draft pick perform so poorly in his first season. That said, Polk is still a talented player, and even though he might face an uphill battle with a new regime taking over, the Pats have a legitimate franchise quarterback in Drake Maye, and Polk could surprise by making a leap in his second year. Even if that doesn't happen in New England, another team that liked Polk during last year's pre-draft process could try to get him for cheap and give him a fresh start elsewhere, and fantasy managers could also be wise to try and acquire him for minimal compensation in hopes he'll deliver on his potential.

KEATON MITCHELL
RB, RAVENS

After going undrafted in 2023 and starting his rookie season on short-term injured reserve, Mitchell exploded over eight games with 396 yards on just 47 carries (8.4 yards per attempt) and a pair of touchdown runs, adding 93 yards on nine receptions. A knee injury ended his rookie campaign early and limited him to only five games in 2024. Too small to be a full-time featured back, Mitchell nevertheless has the speed and versatility to be a valuable weapon, whether that's in Baltimore or with another team that wants to give him a bigger role elsewhere. Regardless of where it happens, Mitchell's explosiveness and big-play ability give him a ton of upside that's worth banking on if he's available in your league.

BRENTON STRANGE
TE, JAGUARS

Yes, the Jags already have Brian Thomas Jr. and No. 2 overall pick Travis Hunter, and they also signed Dyami Brown in free agency. But the departure of Evan Engram leaves Strange as the default starter at tight end, and he showed flashes down the stretch last season that highlighted the athleticism and upside that made him a second-round pick in 2023. New management might favor the targets they've acquired since taking over, but Trevor Lawrence already has a connection with Strange that clearly improved throughout the 2024 campaign. While opposing defenses are busy trying to slow down Thomas and Hunter, Strange could prove to be a reliable target for Lawrence when it's time to move the chains in the short/intermediate areas of the field — and especially in the red zone.

JOE MILTON III
QB, COWBOYS

Deep-league dynasty stashes are all about upside and high-end physical traits, as well as a situation that could provide a promising opportunity. The Cowboys acquired Milton from the Patriots this offseason to replace the departed Cooper Rush and Trey Lance, leaving the former Tennessee quarterback as the primary backup to Dak Prescott. While Prescott is often a high-quality starter when healthy, he's coming off yet another season-ending injury, and he'll turn 32 this summer. Milton showed flashes of elite athleticism and arm talent in limited work for the Pats last season, and while he still needs a ton of development, any time that Prescott misses this season and beyond would put Milton in charge of an offense that features wide receivers CeeDee Lamb and George Pickens, which would be a situation full of potential.

ERIC CANHA-IMAGN IMAGES

MALIK WASHINGTON
WR, DOLPHINS

On the surface, the Dolphins have one of the league's better wide receiver tandems in Tyreek Hill and Jaylen Waddle, but both have struggled to stay healthy, and Hill could still be a potential trade target for other teams. Waiting in the wings is Washington, a sixth-round pick in last year's draft who picked up steam late in his rookie season, catching 16 passes for 169 yards over the final four games of the year. If Hill or Waddle miss more time due to injury, or if Hill is sent elsewhere, Washington could be in line for a much bigger role in the passing game. It won't be surprising if he builds on the success he found down the stretch last year as he develops an even stronger rapport with Tua Tagovailoa.

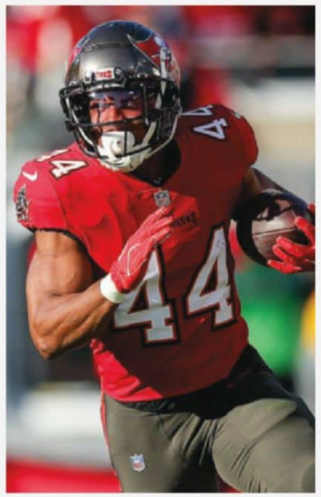
JACOB COWING
WR, 49ERS

The 49ers just spent a first-round pick on Ricky Pearsall last year, and Brandon Aiyuk and Jauan Jennings give them a strong starting tandem. But with Aiyuk's return from last year's devastating knee injury still somewhat of a question mark, and after the departure of Deebo Samuel to Washington, there's room for a young talent like Cowing to emerge. Undersized but explosive, Cowing didn't see much action in the offense last year, but he made the most of his few opportunities, catching four of his six targets for 80 yards. That 20-yards-per-catch average could earn him more downfield looks from Brock Purdy this season, especially if Aiyuk struggles to return to form and/or San Francisco needs someone to replace Samuel's big-play presence after the catch.

SEAN TUCKER
RB, BUCCANEERS

Tampa Bay has one of the league's best 1-2 backfield punches in Bucky Irving and Rachaad White, but Tucker is lurking in the shadows with sky-high dynasty potential. After Tucker's heart condition was discovered at the NFL Scouting Combine, he went from a likely mid-round pick in 2023 to going undrafted. The Bucs scooped him up as a rookie free agent, and after a quiet rookie campaign, Tucker flashed his three-down skill set in a blowout win over the New Orleans Saints in Week 6 last season, racking up nearly 200 total yards and scoring on the ground as well as through the air. A well-built back who can run with speed and power and catch the ball out of the backfield, Tucker could push White for RB2 snaps in Tampa Bay, or another team could come calling with a more significant role if the Bucs are willing to part with him. Either way, the 23-year-old has his arrow pointing way up.



YOU'VE BEEN CHOPPED

GUILLOTINE LEAGUES ARE A NEW (AND MORE STRESSFUL) WAY TO PLAY FANTASY

BY CRAIG ELLENPORT

Traditional fantasy football hasn't changed much in decades, with most leagues operating much like the very first one. For those keeping score, that's the Greater Oakland Professional Pigskin Prognosticators League back in 1963. The GOPPPL might have lacked an online draft, but the premise was the same.

Most leagues have 10, 12 or maybe 14 teams, with head-to-head play; teams with the best win-loss records meet in the playoffs during the last few weeks of the NFL regular season. Simple.

Well, there's a new game in town. And if traditional fantasy football weren't stressful enough, this one turns the dial up to 11.

GuillotineLeagues.com launched in 2020 as the brainchild of longtime fantasy sports guru Paul Charchian, who's been a fantasy football fixture since 1993.

"It was a revelation," says Charchian, who created the first-ever weekly fantasy football magazine, which morphed into Fanball.com. "This is unlike any way I've played before. My Monday nights have completely changed."

Why the Monday stress? In traditional fantasy, you or your weekly opponent might have key players featured on Monday Night Football who can impact your success for that particular week. In a guillotine league, any number of players from any number of teams can do something on Monday night that ends your fantasy season right then and there. How's that for stress?

> IN A GUILLOTINE LEAGUE, RISK IS WHAT GETS YOU CHOPPED. AND YOUR HIGH-RISK, HIGH-REWARD PLAYERS, IF THREE OF THEM FLOP IN THE SAME WEEK, YOU'RE CHOPPED, AND YOUR SEASON JUST ENDED.

Here's how the guillotine league premise works:

A standard guillotine league begins the season with 18 teams, with 14 players per team (eight starters, six reserves). Instead of head-to-head play, each week is its own elimination round. The lowest-scoring team each week gets chopped (thus, the guillotine). So by the time Week 18 rolls around, there is only one team left standing. It doesn't really matter how well or poorly you do each week, as long as you avoid elimination and live to play another week.

Then there's the waiver wire. Each week, after a team is eliminated, that team's players go back into the free-agent pool. So every week there will be more big names available. By the time December rolls around, the few remaining teams should have rosters loaded with top-tier fantasy players. It's no guarantee, however, as free agents are acquired via blind bidding. Each team gets a Free Agent Acquisition Budget (FAAB) of $1,000 for the season, so allotting that budget can be tricky.

"So much of your success will hinge on when you decide to push those chips in," says Charchian. "If you wait too long and get chopped, you go to your grave with $850 out of the $1,000, and you could have spent it and stayed alive.

"And if you push your chips in too early, then at the end of the year, when superstar-laden rosters are getting chopped, you don't have the money to keep up with the bidding of the other players. And so part of the totally unique strategy of guillotine leagues is: When do I spend my FAAB? When do I reach for great players and try to get them on my roster?"

With 18 teams to start, no team will be "loaded" when the season begins. Imagine having the first overall draft pick in a snake draft. Maybe you grab Ja'Marr Chase with the top pick. Your next two picks are Nos. 36 and 37. Based on average draft position rankings, you're looking at players like running back Joe Mixon and wide receiver Garrett Wilson. And while veteran players in traditional fantasy might not think about drafting a quarterback until the fifth round or later, when they can get a guy like Jared Goff at that point, the fifth round of an 18-team draft leaves you with the likes of Brock Purdy or Dak Prescott.

Charchian's draft approach is to preach conservatism. Since the priority isn't so much building the best team possible as it is avoiding a worst-case scenario, it's important to play it safe.

"You have to change your draft mindset very radically from how you do business in a traditional league," says Charchian. "In a normal redraft league, your goal is to come out of the draft with that one team that's so exceptional that it can be the one surviving team out of 12. And that oftentimes means you have to eschew safe players to have enough upside risk guys that you can have differentiators on your team to get to be that one best team.

"Whereas, in a guillotine league, risk is what gets you chopped. And your high-risk, high-reward players, if three of them flop in the same week, you're chopped, and your season just ended."

Unlike traditional leagues, there is so much more room to improve your team each week with the new pool of available free agents. Knowing there will be better options on the horizon, it's also a good strategy to look at the NFL schedule and lean toward drafting players who might have good matchups in the first few weeks of the season. Survive and advance, right?

GREGORY FISHER-IMAGN IMAGES

Like many players, James Cook is a no-brainer in season-long fantasy drafts, but his value can be viewed differently in a guillotine league.

For instance, James Cook will be a valuable fantasy running back in 2025, but what if the Buffalo Bills open the season against the Baltimore Ravens, who led the NFL in rushing defense last year? Cook averaged 53 rushing yards in his two games vs. Baltimore last season, with no touchdowns. If you invest highly in Cook and he struggles in Week 1, your guillotine league season could be over before it begins.

Conversely, you can let another team draft players with tough Week 1 matchups and then bid for those guys when that team gets chopped.

Charchian reports that GuillotineLeagues.com has seen steady growth since it launched in 2020, with the biggest spike coming last summer when his site was purchased by Matthew Berry's Fantasy Life. He counts guillotine league players in the hundreds of thousands.

"I continue to work closely with them on guillotine leagues," he says. "But they have more resources to throw at it, really in every sense. So you're going to see a ton more content coming in the summer, in the next year."

Charchian says he hasn't seen any imitators — yet. He does think that as the format grows in popularity, other fantasy sites will offer it.

"But remember, we did it first, and we're doing it best," he says. "And this is our main focus. This is what we do. It's not just a little side niche for us. This is the life we live. We live, breathe and eat guillotine leagues around here."

EXPLAINING EFP

EFP stands for Expected Fantasy Points, the total fantasy points projected by Athlon Sports for QBs, RBs, WRs, TEs, Ks and D/ST units using a performance-based, PPR scoring system. The EFP is just an extra bonus for readers who enjoy the convenience of seeing a projected points total next to each player.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Allen has proved he's a more reliable scoring bet year to year than Lamar Jackson. He continues to deliver as a rusher and passer.

Only Josh Allen could generate a top-4 fantasy quarterback season and have it feel like a down year. It was actually his "worst" scoring season since the 2020 breakout, but no QB has scored so consistently over the past five years. Allen got off to a shakier fantasy start in Joe Brady's first full season as offensive coordinator but logged four No. 1 finishes for the year. His passing production would benefit from wide receiver Keon Coleman developing further in Year 2. Tight end Dalton Kincaid also has room to grow and the athleticism to help.

INJURY CONCERNS

TREVOR LAWRENCE, JACKSONVILLE JAGUARS After missing only one start in his first three seasons, Lawrence missed seven games in 2024 with a shoulder injury and a concussion. The December concussion had one long-term benefit: Lawrence was put on IR, and so he had shoulder surgery before the end of the season. Because of the timing, he is expected to be back at full strength when the '25 season begins.

JORDAN LOVE, GREEN BAY PACKERS Love suffered an MCL sprain in the season-opening loss to the Philadelphia Eagles in Brazil but came back strong in Week 4. He started every game after that, though he did miss time in two other games with groin and elbow injuries.

PATRICK MAHOMES, KANSAS CITY CHIEFS Mahomes didn't miss any playing time due to injury last year, but it was the second season in a row in which he suffered an ankle injury in the postseason that gave Chiefs fans a scare. The ankle might not have been 100% in Super Bowl LIX. It's not a major concern going into the season, but it's something to keep an eye on.

J.J. MCCARTHY, MINNESOTA VIKINGS After a knee injury ended McCarthy's rookie season before it ever started, we really don't know how durable he can be. Vikings head coach Kevin O'Connell is confident enough to hand him the starting job, but McCarthy was a run-first quarterback at Michigan, so he'll always be in danger of taking hard hits.

DAK PRESCOTT, DALLAS COWBOYS Coming off a season in which he missed nine games with a bad hamstring injury, Prescott could return to form given that he has a history of coming back strong from injuries. The bad news is that he's had a few injuries — missing nine or more games in two of the past five seasons.

ANTHONY RICHARDSON/DANIEL JONES, INDIANAPOLIS COLTS The Colts signed Jones to compete for the starting job with Richardson, who was the team's first-round pick in 2023. Problem is, both of these mobile quarterbacks have a penchant for getting injured. Richardson has missed 19 games in his two NFL seasons. Jones has started as many as 16 games in only one of his six seasons, averaging eight games in each of his past two.

MATTHEW STAFFORD, LOS ANGELES RAMS At 37, it's fair to think that Stafford is susceptible to missing time. He started 16 games last season and has missed only three games in the last two seasons, but he played through ankle and rib injuries at various points last year. More importantly, there was time after the 2022 season that some thought Stafford might retire due to shoulder issues. He clearly proved the shoulder was okay, but for how long?

TUA TAGOVAILOA, MIAMI DOLPHINS Tagovailoa was healthy when the season ended, but he missed four games in September and October while in concussion protocol — the second time in three seasons that the Miami quarterback has dealt with serious concussion issues. Last season's episode led to speculation that Tagovailoa might retire. He clearly wants to play, but it's also clear that he is always one bad hit away from being done.

ADOT tracks the distance downfield each pass travels before it is complete, incomplete or intercepted. Quarterbacks with high ADOT marks generally take more chances, which will lead to more coveted big plays. Shown here are the top 40 ADOT marks among QBs who dropped back to pass at least 100 times during the 2024 season.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Allen has proved he's a more reliable scoring bet year to year than Lamar Jackson. He continues to deliver as a rusher and passer.

Only Josh Allen could generate a top-4 fantasy quarterback season and have it feel like a down year. It was actually his "worst" scoring season since the 2020 breakout, but no QB has scored so consistently over the past five years. Allen got off to a shakier fantasy start in Joe Brady's first full season as offensive coordinator but logged four No. 1 finishes for the year. His passing production would benefit from wide receiver Keon Coleman developing further in Year 2. Tight end Dalton Kincaid also has room to grow and the athleticism to help.

You can shuffle the order of these top quarterbacks a bit. But don't bet against Hurts, who's likely to settle fourth at the position in ADP.

Take out the Week 16 game Hurts left early last year, and his fantasy scoring average would have ranked fourth at the position. His rushing — including double-digit TDs in four straight seasons — makes him a better bet to stay in elite range than Baker Mayfield and Joe Burrow. Hurts' big advantage in rushing touchdowns makes him a sturdier bet than Lamar Jackson. There's also plenty of room for Hurts' passing production to climb after a 2024 that saw A.J. Brown, DeVonta Smith and Dallas Goedert each miss multiple games.

Daniels has clearly shown that he has the upside to lead this position in scoring. He's already the No. 1 quarterback for dynasty.

Daniels just delivered the second-largest fantasy output ever for a rookie quarterback, trailing only 2011 Cam Newton. It'll be tough to beat Newton's 14 rushing scores from that year; even Newton never matched that number again. But Daniels beat that Newton season in rushing yards per game and passing performance. Now he adds wide receiver Deebo Samuel to Terry McLaurin and retains tight end Zach Ertz. Washington showed immediate confidence in Daniels by ranking eighth in neutral-situation pass rate in 2024, according to RBSDM.com.

Jackson's not going to kill any fantasy teams if he's healthy, but he's more fragile than the other top quarterbacks and OK to pass over as QB1-2 in ADP.

Jackson's rushing obviously factors mightily into his fantasy scoring. But the biggest difference between his two position-leading seasons and the significantly lower scoring averages other years has been high passing-TD rates. Jackson led the league in that category in both 2019 (9.0%) and last year (8.6%). He's the active leader in career TD rate. But he also landed at 5.4% over the four seasons between the big years. There's luck to TD scoring, which is why you'll rarely see even a 6% rate in consecutive seasons.

Mahomes won't go late enough to be a strong value. But he's likely to settle at a clear sixth in ADP and has the upside to outperform that.

Mahomes' yards per attempt fell way down over the past two years after Tyreek Hill left and with Travis Kelce shortening his range. The Chiefs have worked to build the wide receiver corps back up over the past two years, though. That included drafting speedy Xavier Worthy in Round 1 last year and bringing Hollywood Brown back after a 2024 that was basically lost to a shoulder injury. If they stay healthy and Rashee Rice avoids suspension, Mahomes could be working with the most talented WR corps of his career — and boost those yards.

Burrow lacks the rushing to be worth drafting among the top 4 in most formats. But he and Patrick Mahomes make a strong 5-6 in either order.

Burrow led the league in completions, attempts, passing yards and touchdown passes in 2024. He did so on a sustainable yards-per-attempt rate (7.5). The TD rate (6.6%) will be more difficult to repeat but wasn't far off from the rates for his other two healthy seasons: 6.5% in 2021 and 5.8% in 2022. The Bengals paid up to keep Tee Higgins and Mike Gesicki, whom Burrow praised as a receiving weapon before last season even began. Cincinnati employed the league's most pass-heavy offense by a decent margin in 2024.

You don't need to draft Fields this high to land him. But he's thoroughly capable of scoring this well. And the Jets paid him to start — at least for 2025.

Fields' scoring average over six starts with the Steelers would have ranked 13th for the season — even with coordinator Arthur Smith handcuffing him as a passer. Fields' 2023 average in healthy games for the Bears would have ranked eighth. He did rank sixth in fantasy points per game in 2022. The rushing alone gives Fields weekly QB1-overall upside, and the 50.2 rushing yards per game for his career set a nice fantasy floor. He'll get Garrett Wilson to be his DJ Moore with the Jets but could use another emergent target.

Love spent the second half of 2023 as one of the league's top fantasy QBs and opened 2024 similarly. Wait beyond this level and pounce.

Even though he sprained his left knee at the end of Week 1 and missed the next two games, Love piloted a Packers offense that passed more early in the season. Green Bay averaged 35.8 attempts through Week 7 and only 26.5 attempts from Week 9 on. And Love finished four of his first five games among the top 11 fantasy QBs. Was the second-half run shift motivated by Love's Week 8 groin injury or Josh Jacobs' play? Either way, Green Bay seems likely to lean at least a bit back toward the pass, especially after drafting a Round 1 receiver.

Fantasy drafters targeted Stroud too early last year. Watch for them to overreact in the other direction and make him a value in 2025.

The way Houston has navigated this offseason tells us that it believed Stroud needed upgrades around him. The Texans signed three potential O-line starters in free agency. They traded for wide receiver Christian Kirk. They drafted WR Jayden Higgins high in Round 2 and his teammate Jaylin Noel the following round. They even moved up for a pass-catching running back (Woody Marks) in Round 4. Stroud appeared on his way to stardom in real-life and fantasy as a rookie. Sacks and WR injuries helped derail his second season.

Murray's likely to be appropriately priced — or even a little too expensive — after some late-season splash games in 2025.

Murray finished 10th among fantasy QBs last year without doing anything special. His passing-TD rate fell short of 4% (well below league average) for the third straight season. He averaged the fewest rushing attempts of his career, trailing even the year in which he returned from an ACL tear. Year 2 with Marvin Harrison Jr. should find an improved connection, while tight end Trey McBride presents a big middle-of-the-field threat. Murray has also said he wants to run more in 2025, which can only help his fantasy scoring.

The OC and receiver imports add hope to Maye, who delivered an intriguing rookie year. He's a nice draft value with big upside.

Maye finished five of his 10 healthy starting weeks last year among the top 12 fantasy quarterbacks and another three among the top 16. He did so despite no Patriots pass-catcher reaching 100 targets. DeMario Douglas led the wide receivers with just 66 catches and 621 yards. And no one caught more than three TDs. New England paid up for Stefon Diggs, though he's coming off an ACL tear. It also drafted WR Kyle Williams, who brings nice downfield speed. Coordinator Josh McDaniels might be the biggest addition.

We don't expect Mayfield to crash as a real-life quarterback, and he's fine to draft at the bottom of QB1 territory. Any higher than that? Pass.

Mayfield's top-4 fantasy finish in 2024 didn't come totally out of nowhere. After joining the Buccaneers, he improved dramatically in 2023 vs. his previous two seasons. It's easy to forget he also delivered nice seasons for Cleveland in 2018 and 2020. (The Browns sure forgot.) But Mayfield will struggle to match his 71.4% completion rate from last year, 7.1 points higher than his previous best (2023). Ditto his 7.2% TD rate, 1.6 points higher than his previous high (2018). A coordinator change only adds to the challenge.

Take Prescott anywhere in this range, and you're getting a quarterback with proven upside beyond this level who got a big wide receiver upgrade.

Prescott's early ADP shows clear recency bias. Sure, he didn't help your fantasy team much even before his injury. But 2023 found Prescott leading the league in TD passes and ranking fifth among QBs in fantasy points per game. That marked the fourth time in five years he had finished in the top seven in points per game. Dallas let Brandin Cooks walk and replaced him with George Pickens. If the former Steeler can overcome his own attitude, he and CeeDee Lamb could be the best WR duo of Prescott's career.

We'll have to see how the run-pass split works out. But rookie Tre Harris boosts the upside for one of the league's better quarterbacks.

The 2024 Chargers shifted from a low 47.6% pass rate over the first six games to a 57.2% rate from Week 7 on. And it wasn't just a matter of falling behind in games. The splits looked similar for neutral situations as well. That coincided with running back injuries, however. The Chargers have since upgraded the backfield, ditching Gus Edwards and J.K. Dobbins for Najee Harris and Omarion Hampton. That seems likely to usher in more rushing. But second-round wide receiver Tre Harris could signal it won't shift back as much.

Goff's second-best scoring average of the past five years ranked 14th (2023). Targeting him higher than that range looks risky.

Goff might seem like he should rank higher after finishing last season sixth among QBs in total fantasy points. But he used outlandish efficiency to reach those numbers. Goff's passing-TD rate (6.9%) stood 2.1 percentage points higher than his career average. His first three Detroit seasons: 3.8%, 4.9% and 5.0%. Goff also hit career highs in completion rate and yards per attempt. He's likely to regress in all three categories, even with the same group of skill players back. Nix obviously can finish inside the top 10, but plenty of QBs who match or beat him in upside will go later than he does.

Nix proved terrific as a rookie, finishing eighth among QBs in total fantasy points. But he finished just seven of his 17 starting weeks among the position's top 12. He also tied for just 20th in Pro Football Focus passing grade and tied for 19th in adjusted completion rate. The Broncos added tight end Evan Engram, but he's a short-range operator who doesn't boost upside. The wide receiver corps holds talent but not much proven production beyond Courtland Sutton. Buy Williams' upside anywhere in QB2 territory. Taking him higher than that adds risk to a still-young QB with a first-time head coach.

Williams didn't play very well as a rookie, by just about any advanced metric you could check. The team has given him lots of help since, though. Head coach Ben Johnson arrives after three years as coordinator for Detroit's outstanding offense. Chicago added tight end Colston Loveland and wide receiver Luther Burden III with its first two picks in the draft. They join DJ Moore and Rome Odunze to form an exciting pass-catching group. The Bears even acquired three interior offensive linemen to try to shore up Williams' protection.

Purdy's fine. He could crack the top 12 again, but he doesn't sport the ultimate ceiling to be a "must" pick before this level.

Purdy's fantasy scoring in 2024 wound up close to his strong 2023 season. But can he sustain the way he did it? Purdy jumped from three carries and two TDs inside the 10-yard line in 2023 to 10 carries and five scores in that range in 2024. He more than doubled his rushing yardage while going from 2.4 carries per game to 4.4. The rushing made up for a significant decline in passing rate stats. Deebo Samuel's departure and Brandon Aiyuk's ACL recovery will challenge passing production, but Christian McCaffery's return helps.

Tua's scoring volatility makes him an easier fit on best-ball rosters and in superflex. Just don't forget about him as a QB2.

We all know the biggest risk with Tagovailoa. Last year's concussion cost him four games. But he did sandwich a 17-start season between that and his 2022 concussion issues. Tagovailoa led the league in completion rate when on the field last year. That followed him leading the league in passing yards in 2023 and in passing-TD rate in 2022. He tends to be a boom/bust weekly scorer, but the ceiling reaches all the way to the top of the position. Tyreek Hill and Jaylen Waddle remain to keep that intact.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Barring a setback with the shoulder he hurt last year, Lawrence should be back in business with upside from his low-QB2 ADP.

Jacksonville tried to help Lawrence in plenty of ways this offseason. The Jaguars imported a pair of linemen. They got a new head coach who ran a strong Buccaneers offense last season. And then they moved up to draft Travis Hunter No. 2 overall — with the intention of playing him primarily at receiver. Hunter and Brian Thomas Jr. give Lawrence a dynamic young pair at the position, while Parker Washington and a committee of tight ends could provide enough over-the-middle options.

Stafford's near-total lack of rushing production caps his fantasy value. He's a solid later QB2 option for multi-QB formats, though.

Stafford's passing-TD rate has been low over the past three seasons. But that seems more luck-driven than anything. His other numbers have remained in line with his previous career rates. His INT rate last season was his lowest in any year that has seen Stafford play more than three games. The Rams upgraded their receiving corps by swapping out Cooper Kupp for Davante Adams. They also improved on last year's tight end situation with a fully healthy Tyler Higbee joined by second-round rookie Terrance Ferguson.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Smith has proved that he's a reliably good passer. But he also posted just OK numbers with better wide receivers in Seattle.

Seattle traded Smith for a mere third-round pick and then gave Sam Darnold $52.5 million guaranteed. But Smith got $66.5 million guaranteed from the Raiders, at a better annual average. Whether Seattle was just ready to move on or couldn't meet his contract demands, the Raiders clearly believe in him. Unfortunately, they offer little support for his passing production beyond tight end Brock Bowers and wide receiver Jakobi Meyers. Smith could use second-round WR Jack Bech or third-year TE Michael Mayer stepping up.

Young gets a slight boost from his rushing, but he needs to show continued passing improvement to become a real fantasy target.

Young made an impressive turnaround from getting benched early in his second season to finally showing some promise at the end of the year. That included four top-12 weeks among his final six games. Young benefited from wide receiver Adam Thielen's healthy return over that span. Carolina added WR Tetairoa McMillan with the eighth pick of the draft. He joins 2024 rookies Xavier Legette and Jalen Coker to offer some receiving hope. Expect a dip from last year's six rushing TDs for Young, though.

ATHLON'S TAKE

McCarthy gets good receivers in a proven scheme and adds sneaky rushing upside (6 yards per carry in college). He's a nice QB2 stash.

McCarthy's knee injury gave us nothing on which to judge his rookie year. But the Vikings have expressed confidence in the 12th overall pick of 2024 and backed that up by not going hard after a No. 2 quarterback. McCarthy proved efficient in a low-volume passing offense at Michigan. He steps into a job, though, that propelled Sam Darnold into the top 10. Vikings QBs scored the seventh-most fantasy points in 2023, despite losing Kirk Cousins to an Achilles tear. And they ranked fifth in 2022, head coach Kevin O'Connell's first season.

Darnold needs to show that he can repeat something close to last season's production before you should consider him in starter range.

Darnold's fantasy scoring average for 2024 beat his previous high by four points, depending on your format. He significantly outperformed his previous numbers in all categories. But how much of that was his maturation, and how much was the Minnesota situation? High-level receivers and good coaching certainly helped. He gets an experienced coordinator in Klint Kubiak, and the $100 million contract says the Seahawks believe in him. Darnold gets a short-range set of receivers, though, with Cooper Kupp joining Jaxon Smith-Njigba.

Wilson's ranked here as though he'll play nearly all season. It's OK to pass on him because of the risk that Dart takes over.

Wilson gets a situation upgrade with his move from Pittsburgh, going from George Pickens to Malik Nabers as lead wideout and Arthur Smith to Brian Daboll as play-caller. Wilson reached the top 9 in fantasy three times over his first six Pittsburgh starts. But he never finished higher than 14th after that. The Giants, of course, drafted Jaxson Dart in Round 1, although Jameis Winston may be a bigger threat to Wilson this season, as Giants brass has said that Dart won't play this season.

The lack of rushing makes Penix tough to get excited about. There's enough surrounding talent to make him a useful QB2, though.

Penix took the job for the final three games last season and looked ... fine. He now enters his first full year piloting an offense with Drake London as lead wideout, Darnell Mooney coming off an impressive first Atlanta season and Bijan Robinson leading a high-value backfield. Falcons coaches even say (again) that they expect tight end Kyle Pitts to improve. Penix led the FBS in passing yards per game his final two years at Washington but offers nothing as a rusher after multiple season-ending injuries in college, including a tearing his same ACL twice.

Ward looks fine-to-good as a long-term fantasy prospect. But this isn't a passing offense to bet heavily on for 2025. Maybe he's a waiver watch.

Ward wound up going well ahead of the rest of a questionable quarterback class in the 2025 draft. Jaxson Dart followed 24 spots later, with only one more QB inside the top 90 picks. Ward goes to a Tennessee team with shaky receivers, though. Calvin Ridley looks solid as the lead guy. But Tyler Lockett is 33 and coming off a cliff season. Treylon Burks can't stay healthy. And the Titans' pair of fourth-round rookie WRs obviously arrive unproven. Don't be surprised if Tennessee tries to use a strong backfield to limit Ward's burden in Year 1.

Rodgers finished his past two healthy seasons ranked just 26th and 21st in points per game. He's not worth the fantasy chase.

Can Rodgers even survive without Davante Adams on his team? We've only seen one full season of that scenario since Adams entered the league. That 2022 campaign featured drop-offs for Rodgers in completion rate, yards per attempt and TD rate. Even last year found Rodgers jumping from 61.8% completions, 6.4 yards per attempt and a 4.1% TD rate over six games without Adams to these numbers with him: 63.8% completions, 6.8 yards per attempt and 5.2% TD rate. The draft capital shows the Saints believe in Shough over Spencer Rattler. This is a situation to avoid for fantasy purposes, though.

Shough will already turn 26 this September. That's because he spent seven years in college, dealing with multiple season-ending injuries — though nothing that looks like a problem going forward. The injuries and switching schools twice left 2024 as Shough's lone full season. Shough brings size, a big arm and sneaky mobility (4.63-second 40 time). New Orleans selected him 40th overall. Derek Carr's May retirement gives the rookie a clear path to start — as long as he proves ready to do so.

Richardson will need to show big passing improvement this summer to hold his job. Neither Colts option looks safe for the season.

The Colts said with words and actions that they would make Richardson win the job this summer if he wants to keep it. His pitiful 47.7% completion rate and 3.0% TD rate clearly won't fly. Daniel Jones got nearly all of the $14 million on his one-year deal guaranteed, pointing to a real possibility he starts games for these Colts. Richardson gets the fantasy edge heading in, simply by virtue of his high-end rushing potential. That helped him to three top-12 fantasy finishes among 11 starts in 2024, plus another at QB13.

Flacco could start Week 1, land in the backup role or even potentially not make the roster. Even if he starts, there's little excitement.

The Browns have given up on Deshaun Watson (finally). Instead, they'll turn to an iffy group of competitors. Flacco easily leads Kenny Pickett and the rookies in experience. That included helping these Browns to the 2023 playoffs with a 4-1 record across his five starts. Flacco returns to find no Amari Cooper. He will have Jerry Jeudy, Cedric Tillman, Diontae Johnson and David Njoku, though. These Browns may lean run a bit more after drafting Quinshon Judkins in Round 2 and Dylan Sampson in Round 4.

Jones doesn't match Richardson as a runner. But rushing still makes him interesting for fantasy if he beats Richardson for the job.

The Colts clearly signed Jones as a challenger for the starting job rather than as a higher-level backup to Anthony Richardson. That's what it says when your new quarterback gets most of the $14 million on his one-year deal guaranteed. Jones hasn't been an exciting passer to date, but he has proved to be more reliable than his new teammate. If/when Jones starts, he would find solid options. Josh Downs and Michael Pittman Jr. have each produced in spite of lacking QB play. Rookie tight end Tyler Warren arrived in Round 1 as well.

If Rattler starts, it'll mean either bad news for New Orleans or remarkable growth from him. We're not holding our breath for the latter.

Rattler got six starts as a fifth-round rookie in 2024. And the Saints were so enamored that they spent the 40th overall pick of this year's draft on a 25-year-old QB who managed just one healthy starting season in college. Rattler should still get a shot to compete with Tyler Shough for playing time in the wake of Derek Carr's retirement. And new head coach Kellen Moore should give everyone a clean slate. Rattler possesses mobility and a good enough arm but seems to lack the rest of the QB tool kit.

Pickett brings modest rushing upside if he takes the field. But it'll be bad news for Cleveland if he wins the starting competition.

The Browns sent a fifth-round pick to the Eagles for Pickett early in an offseason that has them searching for a new QB. That's less than Philly gave Pittsburgh to make Pickett the backup in 2024, but he'll at least compete for the open starting job. Cleveland also signed Joe Flacco to a one-year deal, two seasons after he helped the Browns reach the playoffs. And the Browns drafted Dillon Gabriel in Round 3 before trading up to add Shedeur Sanders in Round 5. Pickett played his way out of the Steelers job within two seasons.

Dart arrives with downfield passing prowess and good rushing ability. That's a strong fantasy combo if he gets on the field.

The Giants traded up from 34th overall to 25th to grab Dart in April. Shortly thereafter, general manager Joe Schoen told reporters, "He's got a lot of makings of a good quarterback, and there's a long way to go." The tenuous job situations for Schoen and head coach Brian Daboll could push them to get Dart on the field earlier. But the team also imported both Russell Wilson (to start) and Jameis Winston this offseason. So the Giants are set up to allow Dart to develop. When he plays, he'll benefit from Malik Nabers' presence.

The hubbub over Shedeur Sanders — who eventually went to Cleveland in Round 5 — overshadowed the first quarterback the team drafted. Gabriel split six college seasons among UCF (three), Oklahoma (two) and Oregon (one). He started for each of those teams and wound up with an FBS-record 155 TD passes vs. just 32 INTs. Gabriel brings enough arm and nice rushing ability. He likely would have gone earlier if he were taller than 5-foot-11. He's got a shot to beat Joe Flacco and others for the job.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Milroe is a fun stash for superflex dynasty leagues. His rushing ability will give him QB1 upside if he ever gets a shot to start.

The Seahawks clearly did not draft Milroe with the intention of having him compete for 2025 playing time. They selected the Alabama quarterback in Round 3, just a month and a half after giving Sam Darnold a $100.5 million contract. Milroe needs significant development as a passer and might not even serve as Seattle's backup this season. (Drew Lock is there as well.) But Milroe's rushing ability is expected to land him some playing time in sub-packages this year and would vault his fantasy ceiling if he does eventually start.

WILL LEVIS

39 WILL LEVIS
6-4/229/AGE: 26

EFP: 36.4
BYE WEEK: 10

ATHLON'S TAKE
Levis has the physical ability to pop for a startable fantasy showing in a given week. But he'll carry just as much bust potential into any outing.

Tennessee gave Levis a shot in 2024 but replaced him with Cam Ward this year. That still positions Levis as the backup to a rookie quarterback. When Levis flashed over the past two years, he did so primarily with strong downfield passing and sneaky mobility. But his decision-making proved terrible, driving a 4% INT rate that trailed only Anthony Richardson and Jameis Winston in 2024. Levis also took sacks at nearly three times the rate (12%) of 2024 Titans backup Mason Rudolph (4.6%).

40 KIRK COUSINS

EFP: 32.2
BYE WEEK: 5

ATHLON'S TAKE
Cousins will stand as maybe the league's best backup QB in 2025. He'll be interesting for DFS and multi-QB formats if pressed into duty.

The Falcons hung on probably longer than they should have before switching from Cousins to Michael Penix Jr. in 2024. The fact that no other team would trade for Cousins around a draft that saw only three quarterbacks taken within the first two rounds says either that the rest of the league also doesn't like Cousins as a starter anymore or that his contract is absurdly large (and probably some of both). Cousins did, at least, supply a pair of high-end fantasy weeks among his 14 starts in his return from an Achilles tear.

6-1/225/AGE: 24

EFP: 27.6
BYE WEEK: 6

ATHLON'S TAKE
Howell's physical ability plus Kevin O'Connell's record to date with quarterbacks would make him interesting for fantasy if J.J. McCarthy goes down.

The Vikings resisted overpaying for a No. 2 quarterback on the free-agent market and drafting one at any point. Instead, they acquired Howell from the Seahawks along with a move down in Round 5. Howell spent 2023 as Washington's starter and then last season as Seattle's basically unused backup. He sports nice arm strength and good rushing ability. But he has also thrown one more INT than he has TDs through three NFL seasons. Kevin O'Connell's Vikings have been great for QB production over the coach's three years there.

42 MARCUS MARIOTA

EFP: 22.2

ATHLON'S TAKE
Mariota would carry fantasy-impact potential if pressed into duty. He's a nice bench stash/handcuff for superflex and two-QB leagues.

Mariota can still run. His last starting turn (2022) found him ranking sixth among QBs in total rushing yards despite playing only 13 games. The two years since have brought scant duty as a backup. But Mariota topped 20 fantasy points in each of the two games last year that offered starter-level duty. If Jayden Daniels goes down at any point in 2025, Mariota would find an upgraded receiving crew, thanks primarily to the trade for Deebo Samuel. Mariota will turn 32 in October and is playing on a one-year contract.

EFP: 19.4
BYE WEEK: 9

ATHLON'S TAKE
Throwing to A.J. Brown and DeVonta Smith would be a nice spot for any quarterback, but McKee would need to prove he's interesting if Jalen Hurts goes down.

The Eagles reportedly felt comfortable trading Kenny Pickett to Cleveland because they believe McKee is ready to back up Jalen Hurts. He threw for 269 yards and two touchdowns in a Week 18 win over the Giants last season, after Philly had locked up the top seed in the NFC. McKee arrived as a sixth-round pick in 2023 after posting modest stats over two years at Stanford: 239.7 passing yards per game and 28 TD passes (3.8% TD rate) vs. 15 INTs (2.0%). He offers no rushing upside, with minus-90 yards for his college career. (Official NCAA stats subtract sack yardage from a QB's rushing total.)

44 JIMMY GAROPPOLO
6-2/225/AGE: 33

EFP: 18.3

ATHLON'S TAKE
Garoppolo would present modest fantasy upside if pressed into starting duty. But he's not worth a stash in any but deep dynasty leagues.

The Rams gave Garoppolo a second straight one-year contract to back up Matthew Stafford. They actually got him for slightly less than they paid in 2024, though — despite a significant increase in the league salary cap. His $3 million salary is low even for a league backup. That seems to indicate there wasn't much of a market for Garoppolo. But backing up Stafford means he would step into an offense that replaced Cooper Kupp with Davante Adams this offseason. And Puka Nacua remains as the No. 1 target.

EFP: 16.6

ATHLON'S TAKE
Tyreek Hill, Jaylen Waddle and head coach Mike McDaniel make this a fertile spot for any QB, but we need to see Wilson do it first.

The Dolphins paid Wilson $6 million on a one-year contract after watching Tyler Huntley and Skylar Thompson prove not good enough as Tua Tagovailoa stand-ins. That's an interesting investment, given that Wilson has thrown TDs on just 2.3% of his career passes (vs. a 2.5% INT rate). He also takes sacks at a high rate (10.2% career). But Wilson lands in a good spot to be a backup. Tagovailoa missed six games last year and has played more than 13 games in just one of his five NFL campaigns.

EFP: 14.6
BYE WEEK: 5

ATHLON'S TAKE
Rudolph hasn't thrown more than two TD passes in any of his 18 career starts. He reached two in half of them. Avoid.

Rudolph probably stands a better chance of starting at some point this season than any Steelers fan would like. Since entering the league as a third-round pick in 2018, Rudolph has started at least one game in five of seven seasons. He has started multiple games twice for the Steelers, who brought Rudolph back after one year of QB missionary work with the Titans. (They upgraded to Cam Ward.) Rudolph would step into a Steelers offense with little receiving talent beyond DK Metcalf and Pat Freiermuth.

JOE MILTON III

ATHLON'S TAKE
Milton would carry some fantasy intrigue if Dak Prescott goes down. But we'd need to see him play before trusting him in non-DFS lineups.

The Cowboys let longtime backup Cooper Rush walk in free agency this offseason and quit on the Trey Lance experiment. Instead, they saw enough in Milton's end-of-season appearance to trade the Patriots a fifth-round pick and install Milton as the backup. Milton boasts impressive arm strength but would need to prove his passing acumen if pressed into duty. Throwing to CeeDee Lamb and George Pickens would help. Milton's 4.68-second 40 time (81st-percentile among QBs) is his most interesting fantasy aspect.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Situation matters less than opportunity for Dobbs. If he plays, his 5.2 career yards per carry will make him a fantasy option across formats.

That New England traded away second-year quarterback Joe Milton III to pay Dobbs more to back up Drake Maye at least indicates that the new coaching staff prefers the veteran's presence over Milton's intriguing physical skills. Dobbs barely saw the field with the 49ers last year but offered surprising fantasy upside with both the Cardinals and Vikings the year before. He wouldn't find impressive receiving options if pressed into duty with these Patriots. But the key to Dobbs' upside will always be his rushing ability.

49 GARDNER MINSHEW II
6-1/225/AGE: 29

EFP: 8.2

ATHLON'S TAKE
Minshew could pop for a starter-level fantasy week here and there if Patrick Mahomes goes down. He's merely a dynasty handcuff, though.

The previous two teams that signed Minshew did so with the intention to start him. That's clearly not the case in Kansas City, where some other guy stands pretty well entrenched. But Minshew fits better as a quality backup anyway. He's competent enough to fill in and keep an offense competitive — especially one with Andy Reid at the controls. Minshew struggles, however, when the team needs too much from him, as was especially the case in Las Vegas. Minshew also retains decent rushing ability at age 29.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Winston's not worth fantasy attention until/unless something changes for him. If he takes the field, though, pay attention.

Winston reminded everyone last season that he'll put up numbers when he gets on the field. His seven Cleveland starts produced a fantasy-scoring average that would have ranked seventh among multi-game starters for the season. But his continued INT binging left Winston settling for a backup contract early in free agency. He'll likely need an injury to Russell Wilson to get playing time with the Giants. Winston could become a summer trade option, though, for another QB-needy team.

INJURY CONCERNS

DE'VON ACHANE, MIAMI DOLPHINS After missing six games with knee and toe injuries as a rookie in 2023, Achane did start 16 games for Miami last season. He missed part of one game last season with a concussion; the bigger concern is potential for injury given his lack of size (5-9, 188).

NICK CHUBB, FREE AGENT After his major knee injury in Week 2 of 2023, it was fully expected the Browns would bring him back very slowly last season. His 102 carries last season were by far the fewest he's had aside from 2023. At 29, logic says Chubb should be in good enough shape to come back strong this season, but at press time, we don't know where that will be.

ALVIN KAMARA, NEW ORLEANS SAINTS Kamara had a nice bounce-back season in 2024, with 1,493 yards from scrimmage and eight total touchdowns. But he still missed two games with a groin injury and was slowed a bit with other injuries. And he turns 30 in July, which is always a concerning age for running backs.

CHRISTIAN McCAFFREY, SAN FRANCISCO 49ERS For those who hoped that McCaffrey's brilliant 2023 season marked an end to his injury jinx, 2024 was a harsh reminder that he is a high-risk, high-reward fantasy player. The fact that McCaffrey suffered Achilles tendinitis in both feet before last season is troubling enough. The fact that he got knocked out with a knee injury shortly after returning to action adds to the concern.

DAVID MONTGOMERY, DETROIT LIONS Montgomery and Jahmyr Gibbs have formed quite the 1-2 punch, but Montgomery has missed some time in each of his two seasons in Detroit. He missed two games in 2023 with a rib injury and three games with a knee injury in 2024, when he finished with a career-low 775 rushing yards (though he did score 12 touchdowns).

ISIAH PACHECO, KANSAS CITY CHIEFS After establishing himself as an unexpected starter for the Chiefs as a rookie in 2022, Pacheco missed a couple of games with a bad shoulder in 2023 and then missed 10 games last season with ankle and rib injuries.

KENNETH WALKER III, SEATTLE SEAHAWKS Walker is a tough runner who craves contact, but that's the problem. His style has led him to miss games in each of his three seasons (appearing in a career-low 11 games in 2024).

JAYLEN WARREN, PITTSBURGH STEELERS Warren has never started a game in his three seasons, but the Steelers obviously think he can hold up after letting Najee Harris sign with the Los Angeles Chargers. Still, Warren, who missed two games last season with a minor knee injury, will likely share time with third-round pick Kaleb Johnson.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Robinson won't bust unless he gets hurt. His combo of rushing and receiving usage plus talent gives him a vaulted fantasy ceiling.

Robinson's role shifted during his first season with the new coaching staff. He ranked just 20th in the league in opportunity share (carries plus targets) through Week 6. From Week 7 on, though, Robinson ranked third, trailing only Saquon Barkley and Jonathan Taylor. Robinson finished with the third-most receptions at the position and fourth-most carries for the year. He heads into just his age-23 season now, controlling the backfield in an offense that should get more efficient after moving on from a run-down Kirk Cousins.

ATHLON'S TAKE

McCaffrey has dominated the fantasy landscape when healthy. That's worth chasing early in your draft. You can find insurance later

If you're apprehensive about taking McCaffrey this early, here's how he ranked in fantasy points per game from 2023 back to the beginning of his career: first, second, eighth, first, first, third and 15th. Those rankings even improve if you're playing full PPR. McCaffrey lost nearly all of 2024 to tendinitis in both calves. But as long as he hits the season with no setbacks in that area — or other issues — McCaffrey should reclaim workhorse-level use in an offense now missing Deebo Samuel and with Brandon Aiyuk coming off an ACL tear.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Barkley was awesome in 2024. But he also had a lot of things go his way. His high ADP ramps up the downside risk for 2025.

Barkley will remain a terrific player in 2025. And Philly will remain the best situation of his career. But Barkley will have trouble repeating his 2024 heights. His rare 5.8 yards per carry beat his career mark by 1.1. He averaged 3.2 more carries per game than his previous high — and stayed healthy. And Barkley ranked just 31st among RBs in receptions. It takes a lot of luck to put all that together and lead the position in fantasy points per game. Barkley lost games to injury in four of his previous six seasons.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Jeanty should get so many touches as a rookie that he'll deliver good fantasy numbers even if the offense limits his efficiency.

The Raiders selected Jeanty sixth overall to become the focal point of their offense. That followed the hiring of Chip Kelly as new offensive coordinator, a head coach who has long proved friendly to RB production. Kelly's four years as an NFL head coach found all four teams ranked among the top 11 in rushing attempts; three of those among the top seven. Jeanty racked up an FBS-leading 2,601 rushing yards last season and caught 80 passes over three Boise State seasons. The next-best RB on his new team is 33-year-old Raheem Mostert.

ATHLON'S TAKE

It used to make sense to bet against an aging Henry at a high ADP, but he has shown that he's a rare physical marvel. Try to not doubt him.

Henry's first Baltimore season found him averaging 5.9 yards per carry, 0.5 more than his previous high. He posted other large numbers as well, but they lined up with his previous production. His 19.1 carries per game, for example, marked just his fifth-highest average. Henry's league-leading TD total marked his seventh straight year of double digits and the third time he led the league. And Henry has lost just two games to injury, outside of a 2021 foot fracture, since becoming a starter in 2018.

EFP: 239.6

ATHLON'S TAKE

Taylor's late-season 2024 production made the case for drafting him even with poor QB play. Any improvement could make him a season-definer.

Taylor's 102.2 rushing yards per game last season ranked third in the league; it was the second-best mark of his career. His 21.6 carries per game beat his previous high by 1.1. And both numbers climbed when Joe Flacco filled in for Anthony Richardson. Taylor finished the season second league-wide in opportunity share, despite tying for just 38th among RBs in targets. These Colts will get either a better Richardson or Daniel Jones stepping in. Jones could deliver a large boost to Taylor's receiving.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Mixon should dominate work again in an offense likely to be better. His ADP well below this position makes him a strong value.

Mixon delivered high-end scoring in his first year with the Texans. Only Saquon Barkley (eight) and Derrick Henry (seven) tallied more top-six weekly finishes in half-PPR than Mixon's six. He proved especially effective before a predictably difficult stretch of matchups to end the season — and despite losing three early games to an ankle sprain. Mixon now enters an age-29 season that has historically been a challenge for RB scoring. But he remains the Texans' clear lead back, as they added only Round 4 pick Woody Marks.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Ranking Gibbs here basically says to pass on him at his lofty ADP. There's more risk than upside from his Round 1 position.

Before David Montgomery went down in Week 15 last season, Gibbs ranked just 17th among RBs in expected half-PPR points per game, according to Pro Football Focus. That's based on both touch volume and where on the field those touches occur. Gibbs' speed and the Lions' strong offense make him a perennial candidate to outperform his expected points. But his workload will remain significantly lower when Montgomery's healthy. Losing offensive coordinator Ben Johnson adds a challenge. Will the Lions stay anywhere near as efficient on offense?

ATHLON'S TAKE
Achane sports top-five scoring upside in half- and full-PPR formats. Expect a better Miami offense as long as Tua Tagovailoa stays healthy.

Achane's receiving usage ramped up from 2.5 receptions per game as a rookie to 4.6 in 2024 — second among RBs. Achane fared even better when Tua Tagovailoa was healthy. He averaged 4.9 targets per game with Tua and only 2.3 across the six games his QB missed. The fantasy scoring changed even more drastically: 19.5 points per game with Tua; 7.7 per game without. That scoring average with his QB would have ranked third for the season. Miami shed Raheem Mostert and added only a Round 6 rookie.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Hall retains easily the most upside among Jets backs, but ceding work to Braelon Allen and Isaiah Davis would lower his ceiling.

Hall's 2024 proved wildly disappointing vs. his first-round fantasy ADP. He tied for just 15th among RBs in expected fantasy points, according to Pro Football Focus, which indicates usage much lower than anyone projected. And he even underperformed those expected points, which seems to indicate he played worse than expected. Hall should remain the Jets' top back, but new head coach Aaron Glenn also said, "We have three running backs on this team that we're going to utilize as much as possible."

ATHLON'S TAKE
Drafters have found reasons to worry about Williams' outlook each of the past two offseasons. Don't fall for it. He's a value in drafts.

There's been some talk of head coach Sean McVay looking to spread backfield touches a bit more. But Williams' two starting seasons have found him ranking first and fourth league-wide in opportunity share (carries plus targets). He has proved effective, especially in the red zone. The Rams drafted Jarquez Hunter in Round 4, a year after taking Blake Corum in Round 3. But McVay's history has favored a clear lead back, and he has called Williams "a very important part of what we want to be moving forward."

ATHLON'S TAKE
New offensive coordinator Klint Kubiak comes from a long line of fostering RB success. His support for Walker makes Seattle's lead back an attractive bet.

Walker endured a tough third season, losing games to oblique, ankle and calf injuries. When on the field, though, he ranked 11th in opportunity share (carries plus targets). That marked a rise from 23rd in his first season under Mike Macdonald's staff. Zach Charbonnet has beaten Walker in rushing yards over expected per carry in consecutive seasons, but new offensive coordinator Klint Kubiak favors Walker. He told reporters at his initial press conference, "Looking forward to him in this scheme, and we're gonna ask a lot out of him."

ATHLON'S TAKE
Cook's situation makes him fine if he slides past his ADP, but we're betting he'll be overrated in 2025. Consider Ray Davis late instead.

Cook's top-10 fantasy finish across formats looked like a breakout season. But he actually got there on 1.0 fewer carries and 0.6 fewer receptions per game than he averaged the year before. His league-leading 16 rushing scores were the main driver. That's a tough stat to count on year to year. Cook tied for just 24th among RBs in expected half-PPR points per game, according to Pro Football Focus, a truer measure of his usage. The Bills' reluctance to meet his salary demands on an extension looks like a signal.

Hubbard's not a high-ceiling player, but his workload looks safe after he ranked eighth in opportunity share last year.

Hubbard finished 2024 on injured reserve, but that late-December calf strain will be a non-factor in 2025. Jonathon Brooks will also be a non-factor, with Carolina already ruling him out for the year coming off a second right ACL tear in as many years. The Panthers drafted Trevor Etienne in Round 4 and signed Rico Dowdle, but neither will challenge Hubbard's role after Carolina extended the incumbent for four years at $8.3 million per year in November. Conner has shown no signs of decline, posting his two largest rushing-yardage totals the past two years. He's a draft value again.

Conner's four seasons in Arizona have found him ranking sixth, 10th, 11th and 15th in fantasy points per game. The low mark came last season. But remove the two games he left early, and Conner jumps to a tie for 10th. Arizona reaffirmed its commitment to him with an extension in late November. Conner comes with loads of injury history but played a career-high 16 games last season. The Cardinals drafted Trey Benson in Round 3 last year but then gave him just 63 carries and six targets for the season.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Jacobs is a fine target if he slides past his ADP. But his elevated draft position adds more risk than he carried into 2024 drafts.

Jacobs' first season in Green Bay featured the second-most carries and rushing yards of his career — along with career highs in rushing TDs and total TDs. It's worth remembering that his best season was followed by a dramatic tumble. Jacobs should remain the clear backfield leader that Green Bay paid him to be in 2024 free agency. But luck goes into staying healthy for 301 carries and scoring all those TDs. As a team, the Packers hadn't averaged as many rushing TDs per game in a season since 1964.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Betting against Kamara would make more sense if the whole draft market weren't pushing him down. He's a strong value in full-PPR formats.

Fantasy drafters underrated Kamara in 2024, scared off by an age (29) that has historically been an inflection point for RB decline — as well as by Kamara's 2023 declines in efficiency. But he delivered a top-10 scoring average across formats and landed a big two-year extension at the end of October. New Orleans should be looking to lighten the workload a bit for Kamara's age-30 season. Even if Kendre Miller and/or rookie Devin Neal prove ready to do that, Kamara will continue to dominate backfield receiving.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Irving would be a solid-to-good bet if he weren't pumped so far up the ADP board. There's too much risk around the 2-3 turn in drafts, though.

Irving's advanced metrics agree with his raw stats: He had a strong debut. Among 47 RBs with 90-plus carries, Irving ranked sixth in rushing yards over expected per carry, second in Pro Football Focus elusive rating and first in yards after contact per attempt. He also checked in sixth in yards per route among 37 RBs with 30-plus targets. The two questions for 2025: Can the 195-pounder hold up for a full season of the increased workload he got late last year? And what will the departure of offensive coordinator Liam Coen mean for the run game?

ATHLON'S TAKE
Jones carries proven upside and decline risk (because of age). His ADP sits in a range that doesn't make him a target or a fade.

Jones reached 15.0 carries per game for the first time in his career last season, despite turning 30 in December. Minnesota then extended him at $10 million per year just ahead of free agency, more than they paid him last offseason. The Vikings also acquired Jordan Mason, though, and gave him a two-year, $10.5 million contract. That combo indicates they were happy with what Jones gave them in 2024 — but also see that they need to lighten his workload. We'll see whether that boosts the yards per carry.

ATHLON'S TAKE

The big question is just how much work Brown retains. His RB1-level ADP leaves more downside risk than upside potential.

Brown's fantasy outlook will depend at least some on what Bengals coaches reveal this summer. They made him a workhorse late in 2024, after losing Zack Moss to a neck injury — and despite adding Khalil Herbert. Brown ranked fourth in the league in opportunity share from Week 9 on, trailing only Saquon Barkley, Jonathan Taylor and Bijan Robinson. Cincinnati then added only sixth-round rookie Tahj Brooks and Samaje Perine, who turns 30 in September, to the backfield. That says they like Brown as the lead back.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Watch for words from new head coach Ben Johnson on Swift this summer. We're betting on better results than in Detroit, but Swift's no lock for production.

Chicago was viewed as a team likely to add RB help in the draft, but the team waited until Round 7 for Rutgers' Kyle Monangai. That's good news for Swift, who's not even built similarly to the power-running Monangai. But it doesn't guarantee anything. Swift played under new head coach Ben Johnson in 2022 with the Lions and drew a career-low 7.1 carries per game. That was less than half the rushing load the team gave Jamaal Williams. Does another Bears RB play the part of Williams this time?

EFP: 179.4

ATHLON'S TAKE

Tennessee should be looking to run plenty to help the rookie QB. Pollard looks like a strong touch bet — and a value on the RB2 fringe.

Pollard has set a new career high in carries per game every season. That's not likely to continue upward from last season's 16.3. But he maintained that hefty workload over the season's second half despite dealing with an ankle sprain and flashes from Tyjae Spears. The No. 2 back did see increased playing time late in the year. But Spears also reached 10 touches just twice in games Pollard didn't miss or leave early. Expect Spears to siphon a bit more work this season — at least to keep Pollard fresh — but for Pollard to lead.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Expect Montgomery to remain heavily involved — perhaps in an even split. Jahmyr Gibbs' late 2024 scoring binge is lowering Monty's ADP.

Before Montgomery went down in Week 15 last year, Pro Football Focus had him 18th among RBs in expected half-PPR points per game — just one spot behind Jahmyr Gibbs. That points to similar workshares for the two players, drastically different from what the end-of-season fantasy points would tell you. Of course, we could see plenty of change in 2025. Detroit already had to replace offensive coordinator Ben Johnson. New guy John Morton spent the past two years as Denver's pass game coordinator and has spent just one year as an NFL coordinator.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Warren's likely not built for a workhorse role. But he could take the larger side of the split he's seen in Pittsburgh and prove quite useful.

The Steelers let Najee Harris walk and reportedly plan to run Warren as the lead back. We'll see just how big that lead is. The team drafted Iowa's Kaleb Johnson in Round 3 and signed former Eagle Kenneth Gainwell. Johnson's primarily an inside thumper but comes off a workhorse final college season that saw him average 6.4 yards per carry and 8.5 per catch. Warren should at least easily lead the backfield receiving. He was also a more efficient runner than Harris before an injury-stunted 2024.

Pacheco was going at the end of RB1 territory last summer. Now you can get him in high-RB3 range. That's screaming value. Get it.

A Week 2 leg fracture effectively ended a 2024 that began with Pacheco playing workhorse. He returned in Week 13 but never got close to full effectiveness. Andy Reid told ESPN's Adam Teicher in April that "most guys probably wouldn't have come back" when Pacheco did. K.C.'s low-level backfield additions this offseason point to trust remaining for Pacheco. Elijah Mitchell and Kareem Hunt got only modest one-year deals. And rookie Brashard Smith arrived in Round 7. Pacheco finished 2023 ranked 15th in fantasy points per game.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Judkins looks nice as a fantasy RB2, with touch upside into RB1 territory. There's some risk that he cedes primary receiving work.

The Browns drafted Judkins with the fourth pick of Round 2, and then general manager Andrew Berry called him a "bell cow" and a "versatile runner." Judkins broke out right away at Ole Miss, leading the SEC in touches, carries, rushing yards and rushing TDs as a true freshman. His three seasons of more than 1,000 rushing yards plus 59 career catches show he can play all three downs. But Cleveland returns Jerome Ford and drafted Dylan Sampson in Round 4. We'll see just how large of a work slice each will take.

Spears at least makes for an upside handcuff behind Tony Pollard. He'll need to siphon more work to make sense in this range, though.

Head coach Brian Callahan called Spears and Tony Pollard interchangeable talents on multiple occasions ahead of the 2024 season. But then he gave Pollard the 10th-largest opportunity share among RBs for the year, while Spears ranked just 45th (both adjusted for games missed). His share was nearly identical to what he got behind Derrick Henry the year before. Tennessee should stop working Pollard at Henry levels if they want to keep him healthy. Spears flashed late in 2024, as Pollard dealt with an ankle sprain.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Najee Harris has been a solid pro but never especially efficient. We're betting on Hampton beating him there and taking the backfield lead.

Despite just having signed 27-year-old former Steelers workhorse Najee Harris in free agency, the Chargers spent the 22nd pick on Hampton. That says they loved the player rather than that they were targeting a need. Harris' presence muddies the initial touch outlook for Hampton. But the veteran got just a one-year, $5.25 million deal. That's certainly not "lead back" money. Hampton's coming off a pair of 1,500-yard rushing seasons and caught 67 balls. This coaching staff will likely give him as much work as he commands.

Honestly, this might prove too low a ranking. Feel free to chase Harvey into RB2 range. Beware of camp buzz inflating his price, though.

Before Harvey arrived, Sean Payton teams had drafted only three other RBs within the first three rounds: Reggie Bush, Mark Ingram II and Alvin Kamara. Pretty good group. Payton said Harvey became a target for him early in the evaluation process. That the Broncos took the UCF product well ahead of what consensus expected shows their fervor. Harvey averaged more than six yards per carry each of the past three seasons and 11.8 yards per catch for his career. He'll compete with a weak returning group.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Robinson's fine, especially if the offense improves further. But he's mainly a fantasy reserve and fits best in non-PPR formats.

Washington added only a seventh-round dart throw (Jacory Croskey-Merritt) to a backfield that finds both Robinson and Austin Ekeler heading into contract years. That says coaches remain comfy with the work split — and players — of last season. Robinson ranked just 29th in the league in opportunity share (carries plus targets, adjusted or games missed). His 15.1% share stood near-identical to 2023 (14.7%). Robinson has lost time to injury in all three seasons, though, and cedes receiving to Ekeler.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Henderson's a nice upside target if he lasts to this range of drafts. Get him too early, and there's risk to his workload and in the team's offense.

The Patriots used the sixth pick of Round 2 to add Henderson to a roster that could have used help at plenty of spots. That points to an immediate role. "We view him as a three-down back and a really good complement," Eliot Wolf, the team's lead personnel executive, said at his press conference following Day 2. That suggests the team believes Henderson can play in any situation but not that it's about to treat him like a 2025 workhorse. The former Ohio State Buckeye should immediately lead receiving, while adding a large chunk of the rushing.

Watch what coaches and reports say throughout summer about Skattebo's expected role. He's the better bet for production either way.

Skattebo's hard-charging rushing style offers a pretty obvious complement to converted wide receiver Tyrone Tracy Jr., who finished last season as the Giants' lead back after arriving as a Round 5 pick. But Skattebo was also a dynamic receiver at Arizona State, catching 69 passes at 12.9 per reception over the past two years. There's room for him to completely take over the backfield. Tracy ranked just 35th in Pro Football Focus rushing grade and yards after contact per attempt last year among 47 qualifying RBs.

At best, plays out like a version of the Harris-Jaylen Warren split in Pittsburgh — with Omarion Hampton a much better version of Warren.

Harris got just a one-year, $5.25 million deal in free agency but still looked like an attempted upgrade over J.K. Dobbins when he arrived. He dropped to second-best RB on the team, though, when the Chargers selected Omarion Hampton 22nd overall. L.A. opened last season running on more than 50% of offensive plays before shifting to one of the pass-heavier units. Perhaps head coach Jim Harbaugh and offensive coordinator Greg Roman return to their roots and go run-heavy. That would allow for two productive RBs.

Johnson's probably less of a receiver than Najee Harris was. Expect Jaylen Warren to outscore him, but there's upside to the rookie as well.

The Steelers have said they believe in Jaylen Warren's ability to lead the backfield since allowing Najee Harris to leave for a one-year free-agent deal. Warren returns on a mere one-year, restricted free-agent tender, though. And Pittsburgh chose Johnson as the sixth RB in the draft, the first of Round 3. Johnson finished his Iowa run as the team's workhorse, racking up 6.4 yards per carry and 21 TDs despite being the obvious focal point of a bad offense. He also added 8.5 yards per catch.

If Cam Skattebo looks better as both a power runner and receiver, it'll be tough to like Tracy as more than a handcuff in a likely bad offense.

The Giants waited until Round 4 to draft Cam Skattebo. So it's possible they still envision Tracy as the touch leader. But Skattebo Is also capable of taking the backfield lead. Tracy ranked just 35th in Pro Football Focus rushing grade and yards after contact per attempt last year among 47 qualifying RBs. He also ranked just 38th in yards per route among 52 RBs who drew 20-plus targets. The converted wide receiver should have shined in that area. Perhaps Tracy shows Year 2 growth at a position he hasn't played for long.

It'll be important to remember that Blue didn't come off the board until Round 5, as the 14th RB in the draft. But he couldn't have landed in a better spot. Dallas has moved on from both Rico Dowdle and Ezekiel Elliott. Free agency brought only Javonte Williams and Miles Sanders, who each disappointed their teams last year. Mason's a high-value handcuff because of Aaron Jones Sr.'s injury history and Minnesota's offensive strength. He's not a standalone starter.

The Vikings re-signed Aaron Jones Sr. after he set a career high in rushing work and controlled the backfield. But they also traded draft capital for Mason and then gave him a $10.5 million, two-year deal. That tells us they want Jones to keep leading but also to not have to take the ball as much as he did last year. Mason proved his ability in relief of Christian McCaffrey last season. But we'll see how effective he can stay outside of a Kyle Shanahan offense that has always proved fertile for RB production.

Charbonnet has been a strong handcuff, because he takes on a full workload when Kenneth Walker III is out. But he's bench fodder when Walker's healthy.

Charbonnet produced good fantasy numbers over his six games of starter duty last season, filling for an injured Kenneth Walker III. But new offensive coordinator Klint Kubiak praised Walker at his initial press conference: "Looking forward to him in this scheme, and we're gonna ask a lot out of him." Charbonnet reached double-digit touches in just one game outside those aforementioned six and fell short of seven carries in nine of 17 games. White's more handcuff than standalone fantasy play at this point. Offensive coordinator Liam Coen's departure adds risk to the run game's outlook.

White had his work limited by Bucky Irving's arrival even before the rookie really took over the backfield late in the year. White exceeded 10 carries in a game only four times. That included the season opener and two games Irving left early. White still scored like a RB2 primarily because of TD fortune. His 11.8% receiving TD rate would be well above average even for a WR. There's potential for Sean Tucker to take on some more work this year, though it helped all the backs that Tampa didn't draft an RB.

If Benson emerges as the clear No. 2 back in Arizona this summer, he'll be a high-value handcuff behind a 30-year-old James Conner.

Benson arrived as a third-round pick last season, the sixth RB off the board. But the Cardinals gave him just 63 carries for the year, matching the combined total for Michael Carter, Emari Demercado and DeeJay Dallas. Benson added only six targets. He remains the biggest backfield talent behind James Conner but will need to prove he's more clearly ahead of the others on the depth chart. The good news: Conner doesn't usually stay as healthy as he did last year. He missed two-plus games each of the previous seven seasons.

ATHLON'S TAKE

McLaughlin has even managed only 1.7 catches per game to date and declined in that area last year. Not much to like here.

Sean Payton has sounded like a fan of McLaughlin at times over the past two years. But the diminutive RB has reached 10 carries in a game just four times since arriving in Denver, and three of those came within the final four weeks of 2024. Denver drafted RJ Harvey in Round 2, marking just the fourth time a Payton team has selected an RB among the first three rounds. The previous three: Reggie Bush, Mark Ingram II and Alvin Kamara. Expect Harvey to clearly lead this backfield in touches right away.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Ford will need a Quinshon Judkins injury to find fantasy relevance this year. Even then, Dylan Sampson would likely lower Ford's ceiling.

The Browns let Nick Chubb walk in the offseason but then drafted Quinshon Judkins in Round 2 and Dylan Sampson in Round 4. Ford can still compete for a role, but the draft wasn't encouraging for his outlook. Ford already dipped from 12.0 carries per game in 2023 (with Chubb out) to just 7.4 last season (with a limited Chubb). Ford remained the clear receiving leader, and that will be his best path to a 2025 role.

ATHLON'S TAKE
The passing game will help the offense as a whole. Expect the RB committee to prove frustrating for lineup-setting leagues.

Williams could garner only a one-year, $3 million contract in free agency ahead of his age-25 season. That's because he has averaged just 3.6 and 3.7 yards per carry the past two seasons. Williams' play motivated Denver to give him a career-low 8.2 carries per game — down 5.4 from the season in which he was coming off a multi-ligament tear. Williams faces modest competitors in Miles Sanders and late-round rookies Jaydon Blue and Phil Mafah.

We'll have to watch for signals of the usage plan here. Stevenson figures to trail TreVeyon Henderson, but the rookie's no workhorse.

The Patriots gave Stevenson a $9 million-a-year contract ahead of last season. But they have since changed coaching staffs and drafted TreVeyon Henderson early in Round 2. Stevenson has grown his carries per game every season. But he has also shrunk his yards per carry the past two years. Stevenson had his worst season of fumbling last year and now must win over a new coaching staff.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Johnson's a solid stash in an open backfield situation. We're betting D'Andre Swift will lead the work and scoring, but he's no lock.

The Bears waited until Round 7 to draft a running back. They added nothing at the position in free agency. And D'Andre Swift's worst season for rushing usage in the pros came with new head coach Ben Johnson as his Detroit offensive coordinator in 2022. That would mean opportunity for Roschon Johnson, who got screwy 2024 usage after a rookie season with some promise. Johnson could beat Swift for short-yardage carries and lead in TDs.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Predicting when to start a Miami RB will be tough. Wright is ideally positioned in a best-bell format, when you can just take the scoring spikes.

Miami drafted Wright in Round 4 after he rocked a 4.38-second 40-yard dash at the 2024 NFL Scouting Combine. He logged just 68 carries and six targets as a rookie, trailing Raheem Mostert in each category. Wright's college record doesn't give us much to believe in on the receiving front. But he averaged 6.2 yards per carry across three seasons at Tennessee. Wright will need to beat out free-agent import Alexander Mattison and sixth-round rookie Ollie Gordon II. But he easily beats both on the speed front.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Dobbins will be useful if he makes his way to a decent role. But the way his offseason played out should leave you unexcited.

Dobbins made an impressive return from his 2023 Achilles tendon tear, setting career highs in carries per game, rushing yards, targets, receptions and receiving yards. But it wasn't as efficient a season as it seemed. Dobbins ranked 39th among 41 qualifying RBs in Pro Football Reference's rushing success rate. He also posted a career-low 4.8 yards per catch. The league's lack of early interest should temper expectations.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Etienne must compete with Rico Dowdle to earn the No. 2 role. He'd likely split work if Chuba Hubbard were to go down, though.

The downside with Etienne: He never led a college backfield, topping out at 131 carries for the 2023 Florida Gators. He also averaged a meh 7.0 yards per catch for his career. The upside: He confirmed his speed with a 4.42-second 40 at the NFL Scouting Combine and then landed in an average Carolina backfield. Chuba Hubbard will clearly lead work after getting a hefty extension in November. But Jonathon Brooks is out for the season, and Rico Dowdle's just Rico Dowdle. Hubbard's limited receiving ability gives Etienne a path to work.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Even if Tuten passes Travis Etienne Jr. in rushing share, expect limited work when everyone's healthy. Tuten is probably a better 2026 bet (dynasty).

Tuten gained attention with his 4.32-second 40 time at the NFL Scouting Combine. But he flashed his upside before that with 6.3 yards per carry and 17 total TDs in his final Virginia Tech season. Tuten's speed manifested in big runs and 105.4 yards per game last year. His mere 6.4 yards per catch across two years with the Hokies, plus a more limited 5.0 yards per rush in 2023, say he doesn't always leverage that speed. He'll compete with Tank Bigsby and Travis Etienne Jr. for work under new head coach Liam Coen, the Bucs' offensive coordinator in 2024.

ATHLON'S TAKE
The Saints' No. 2 back should siphon some carries from Alvin Kamara to keep him fresh. Miller's worth a late stash in case he's it.

Miller landed in New Orleans as a third-round pick just two years ago — the fourth RB off the board, ahead of Tyjae Spears, De'Von Achane, Tank Bigsby and Chase Brown (among others). Injuries — and a possible rift with former head coach Dennis Allen — limited Miller to 95 touches over his first two seasons. There's opportunity to turn that around under a new coaching staff. Alvin Kamara remains as the clear lead back, but sixth-round rookie Devin Neal stands as the stiffest competition for the No. 2 spot.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Lloyd will need to beat out Emanuel Wilson for the No. 2 RB spot. But playing handcuff to Josh Jacobs would carry high upside.

It's easy to forget the Packers drafted Lloyd in Round 3 just last year. He preceded Bucky Irving and Tyrone Tracy Jr. — among others — as the fourth back off the board. And they did so after signing Josh Jacobs. But Lloyd endured terrible injury luck. There was a hip injury in training camp, a hamstring issue in the preseason, an ankle sprain in his regular-season debut and then appendicitis on the brink of his return. Green Bay added nothing to the 2025 backfield, which looks like a vote of confidence for Lloyd.

ATHLON'S TAKE
The Buffalo offense makes Davis a high-value handcuff. Just don't expect him to contribute when James Cook is healthy.

Davis spent his rookie year splitting work with Ty Johnson behind James Cook. Davis more than doubled Johnson's carry total but trailed him in targets. Davis, however, took the backfield lead for the Week 6 game Cook missed and the Week 18 contest he left early. Davis tallied 23 and 18 opportunities in those games. Cook and Johnson remain in place, but Buffalo didn't add any other challenges. Cook heads into the final year of his rookie deal. And it hasn't sounded like the two sides are close on an extension.

Etienne's style requires big plays for value, and he hasn't been providing them. Don't be surprised if he loses more touches.

Etienne entered 2024 as Jacksonville's lead back. But then Tank Bigsby outperformed him as a rusher. And then Jacksonville changed coaching staffs. And then the Jaguars drafted Bhayshul Tuten in Round 4. There have been murmurs that Liam Coen's staff doesn't love Etienne, though he remains at least the team's best receiving back. None of the trio looks like a potential lead back for 2025. Expect a committee approach when all are healthy.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Shipley obviously wouldn't come close to full-Saquon Barkley if the starter goes down. But he's a high-upside handcuff in a strong offense.

Shipley trailed Kenneth Gainwell as the third back in his rookie season. Gainwell has left for Pittsburgh. Philly imported A.J. Dillon, but his skills complement Shipley's more than was the case with Gainwell. If Saquon Barkley goes down, we'd likely see the remaining RBs share work. Shipley, who caught 85 passes across three Clemson seasons, would claim the backfield receiving lead but can also run inside some — despite his smallish size. Don't be surprised if sheer luck cuts into Barkley's workload vs. 2024.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Hill can be useful in the deepest PPR leagues. But he obviously needs a Derrick Henry injury to approach his fantasy ceiling.

Playing No. 2 behind Derrick Henry doesn't leave many carries (3.1 per game in 2024). But it did allow Hill stronger receiving production than he got with his old backfield mates. Hill finished last season 20th among all RBs in targets, tied for 14th in receptions and 11th in TD catches. A healthier Keaton Mitchell could siphon some work, but Baltimore extended Hill last September. So the team clearly values his contributions.

Bet on Dallas spreading the ball around its backfield to a degree that will annoy fantasy managers. Sanders is probably a waiver watch.

Sanders heads into just his age-28 season, and his move to Dallas presents obvious opportunity. He got less than half as much money as Javonte Williams on their respective one-year deals, but Williams also comes off a disappointing couple of years. They'll compete with late-round rookies Jaydon Blue and Phil Mafah in what should be a pass-leaning offense.

Kyren Williams has dominated work in L.A. the past two years. Corum looks like the lower-ceiling side of a handcuff battle.

As a third-round rookie, Corum never carved out a meaningful offensive role. He topped out at eight carries in a game (three times) and only once caught more than one pass in a game. Corum fractured his right forearm in Week 18, but that shouldn't be an issue for 2025. Fourth-round rookie Jarquez Hunter could be. The Auburn alumnus brings more speed than Corum: 4.44 seconds in the 40-yard dash, compared with 4.53 for Corum. He also beat Corum in college receiving production.

Allgeier's actually coming off his most efficient rushing season so far. He's no standalone value but rather a high-upside handcuff.

Allgeier saw his work dip in the first season under Raheem Morris' staff. The coaches started giving Bijan Robinson true workhorse loads around midseason. Allgeier saw just a slight dip over that span, though, from 9.7% opportunity share (carries plus targets) through Week 6 to 8.4% from Week 7 on. Atlanta added nothing in the offseason, which keeps Allgeier positioned as the clear No. 2. He heads into the final year of his rookie contract at just 25.

Moss vs. rookie Tahj Brooks will be worth watching for handcuff purposes. Expect Chase Brown to retain backfield control when healthy.

Moss lost the final nine games of last season to a neck injury. He lost the backfield lead to Chase Brown even before that. An offseason contract restructure lowered Moss' salary for 2025 but still left some guaranteed money. It's not enough to lock in Moss' role but might keep him from being cut. Moss will compete with sixth-round rookie Tahj Brooks, who comes off a pair of workhorse seasons at Texas Tech.

We'll see whether an offensive coordinator change encourages a backfield shakeup. Tucker's interesting as a very late bench stash.

Tucker announced himself with 192 total yards and two TDs in the Week 6 game that Rachaad White missed. But he sank back into the shadows immediately thereafter. Tucker logged 29% of his touches (17) for the season in that contest. A team source told NBC Sports' Matthew Berry at the NFL Scouting Combine, though, that Tucker "has the talent to be a No. 1 RB in this league." Even with Bucky Irving taking the backfield lead late last year, there's room to siphon more work from Rachaad White, who disappointed in 2024.

Mitchell's a bit of a mystery after losing all of 2024 to injury. But if the Chiefs believe, then he's worth a bench stash in fantasy.

The Chiefs have typically waited until later in the calendar to secure RB insurance. Just last year, they signed Samaje Perine at the end of August and then added Kareem Hunt only after Isiah Pacheco broke a leg. Signing Mitchell early in this year's process indicates both that the Chiefs targeted him and that they prioritized securing backfield depth. Mitchell's still likely battling Kareem Hunt and seventh-round rookie Brashard Smith for limited work.

Watch the Guerendo-Jordan James camp battle to see who emerges in the league's top handcuff role. Both could be worth stashing.

Guerendo watched the 49ers allow Elijah Mitchell to walk in free agency and trade Jordan Mason to the Vikings. That seemed to signal belief in Guerendo as the No. 2 back behind Christian McCaffrey, who's coming off a season lost to issues in both calves. San Francisco added competition with fifth-round pick Jordan James. He produced as both rusher and receiver at Oregon, even siphoning some touches from Bucky Irving. James doesn't come close to Guerendo's big-play speed (4.33), though.

Gibson's got a better shot of getting cut than climbing the depth chart. Leave him alone unless the other Pats RBs get hurt.

When the Patriots drafted TreVeyon Henderson with the sixth pick of Round 2, they effectively nabbed an upgraded version of Gibson. Henderson averaged 6.4 yards per rush and 11.1 per catch for his Ohio State career. Gibson reportedly still knows where the field is, but he managed a career-low 1.4 receptions per game last season while trailing well behind Rhamondre Stevenson in carries. 66 TY JOHNSON

5-10/210/AGE: 27

EFP: 63.0
BYE WEEK: 7
ATHLON'S TAKE

Johnson's a role player who would see limited work even if James Cook went down. He's not worth much attention.

Johnson trailed well behind James Cook and Ray Davis in carries last year. He edged Davis in receiving work, though, falling just 13 targets short of Cook's total for the season. The trio returns to likely occupy the same roles. That means third-down-type opportunities for Johnson, who heads into his age-28 campaign. Johnson's 2.4 carries per game in 2024 were the second-lowest of his career to date. His receiving success rate has climbed in Buffalo, though.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Sampson could beat Jerome Ford for the top backup role, but he'll need to prove he could take over Ford's receiving. Watch the competition.

Cleveland selected Sampson in Round 4 as the 12th RB off the board, two rounds after selecting Quinshon Judkins. That says the team believed it needed a significant backfield upgrade. The Browns have moved on from Nick Chubb, but Jerome Ford remains after leading in touches each of the past two years. Sampson will need to beat out Ford for a rookie-year role. But Judkins' draft capital — and words from Browns decision-makers after that — point to the Buckeye taking immediate control of the backfield.

EFP: 59.2
ATHLON'S TAKE

Denver's not a great backfield to mine for handcuff options. A Harvey injury would likely split work between Estime and Jaleel McLaughlin.

Estime managed just 5.8 carries per game and trace amounts of receiving usage in a 2024 backfield full of lackluster players. Denver grabbed RJ Harvey in Round 2 this April, marking just the fourth time a Sean Payton team has ever drafted a running back within the first three rounds. The first three: Reggie Bush, Mark Ingram II and Alvin Kamara. There's room for Estime to claim a power-back role. At 227 pounds, he's 18 pounds heavier than his nearest backfield mate (Harvey). Estime offers no receiving upside, though.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Mostert will need to show through summer that he's got enough juice left. If he does, there's some late handcuff upside.

The Raiders didn't draft Ashton Jeanty sixth overall to lead a committee. Behind him, though, Mostert might be the team's next best — even at 33. His work cut in half in his final Miami season, but nagging injuries and losing Tua Tagovailoa for six full games didn't help. In Vegas, Mostert's competing with Sincere McCormick and Zamir White for roles. McCormick stepped up late in his rookie season, but he'll have to impress a whole new coaching staff now.

BYE WEEK: 9
ATHLON'S TAKE

All three Jets RBs are draftable in 12-team leagues of decent depth. We'll see how work splits, but there's at least handcuff upside.

New Jets head coach Aaron Glenn said in late March, per ESPN's Rich Cimini, "We have three running backs on this team that we're going to utilize as much as possible." It's one thing for a new coach to profess excitement for players on a roster he's just getting familiar with. It'll be another if he gets through summer and still favors timeshare conditions. Allen impressed as both a runner and receiver last season, taking touches from Breece Hall. But he also ceded some of that work to Isaiah Davis late in the year.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Perine's a reliable passing-game back but hasn't reached 100 carries in a season since his 2017 rookie campaign. Ignore.

Perine signed a two-year deal to return to his former team, but that included just $40,000 guaranteed. That's not even enough to lock Perine into a 2025 roster spot, and he'll compete with Zack Moss and Round 6 rookie Tahj Brooks for roles behind Chase Brown. If he does stick on the roster, Perine could lead Cincinnati's backfield in receptions. He tallied 65 catches over his last two full seasons in Cincinnati, despite Joe Mixon being in place.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Joe Mixon's getting older and has played every game just twice in his eight years. Marks is a nice handcuff in what should be a good offense.

The Texans gave a 2026 third-rounder to move up for Marks in Round 4. What did they see? Head coach DeMeco Ryans told reporters after the draft: "Really like him out of the backfield catching the football. Really great hands. Really has that ability to make guys miss at the line of scrimmage and the ability to play behind his pads, play physical." Marks caught 261 balls across five college seasons, but it sounds like he could be more than a passing-down specialist. There's a clear path to take over the No. 2 job.

EFP: 49.7
ATHLON'S TAKE

Davis might get more work than Breece Hall managers would like. He'll still need a Hall injury to approach fantasy relevance, though.

Davis spent most of his rookie season barely seeing the field but popped up for 37 of his 42 total opportunities (carries plus targets) over the final six weeks. He remains in a crowded backfield with Breece Hall and Braelon Allen. But Hall might not claim as big a lead as he has seen in the past. New head coach Aaron Glenn answered an early question about Hall by saying he has "three running backs on this team that we're going to utilize as much as possible." Davis will compete primarily with Braelon Allen for touches.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Hunt wasn't so much good last year as he was the best option K.C. had. Expect him to be third in line for touches at best in 2025.

The Chiefs didn't sign Hunt until mid-September last season but then quickly inserted him as the backfield leader while Isiah Pacheco recovered from a leg fracture. They secured him much earlier this offseason — but also after signing former 49ers RB Elijah Mitchell. The small, one-year contracts for each install them as backups to Pacheco. Hunt enters his age-30 season off three straight years of sub-4.0 yards per carry.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Singletary's not exciting, but he was decent for the 2023 Texans. A summer trade — or late-August release — could make him usable.

Singletary enters 2025 behind at least Tyrone Tracy Jr., who passed Singletary on the 2024 depth chart as a fifth-round rookie. And Singletary will probably have a tough time fending off fourth-round rookie Cam Skattebo, who averaged 5.5 yards per carry and 12.9 per catch across two years at Arizona State. Singletary had lead-back stretches for last year's Giants and the 2023 Texans, though. There are teams for which he could carve out a 2025 role.

INJURY CONCERNS

BRANDON AIYUK, SAN FRANCISCO 49ERS Aiyuk's 2024 campaign ended with an ACL/MCL injury that required surgery. The fact that the 49ers traded away Deebo Samuel and didn't make any drastic moves in the draft implies that they expect Aiyuk to be ready to contribute this season.

HOLLYWOOD BROWN, KANSAS CITY CHIEFS After a serious preseason shoulder injury, Brown made his debut in Week 16. He posted pedestrian stats in the five total games (including playoffs) that he played, but he's healthy and good to go. Brown has yet to start every game of a season in his career.

TANK DELL, HOUSTON TEXANS After missing six games as a rookie in 2023, Dell suffered a serious knee injury late last season. Even if he's back for the start of 2025, it's unlikely he'll be 100% for a while.

STEFON DIGGS, NEW ENGLAND PATRIOTS A torn ACL in Week 8 ended his first season with the Houston Texans. After he posted videos chronicling his offseason rehab progress, the Pats signed him as a free agent. Diggs should be ready for the start of the season, but at 31, wear and tear could be a factor.

ZAY FLOWERS, BALTIMORE RAVENS Flowers has played in 33 of 34 regular-season games since joining the league, but he was inactive for Baltimore's two playoff games last season with a knee injury. He was expected back had the Ravens advanced, but a 5-foot-9, 175-pound receiver is always an injury risk.

XAVIER LEGETTE, CAROLINA PANTHERS Legette was bothered by a nagging foot injury that required surgery after the season. It was minor surgery, and Legette is expected to be full-go in training camp. Legette's role is due to change after the team drafted receiver Tetairoa McMillan No. 8 overall.

CHRIS OLAVE, NEW ORLEANS SAINTS Olave took a major step back in 2024. That was due in part to a concussion that kept him out for three games (and he played in only eight total). That was his third concussion in three seasons, so there's clearly a possibility that it can happen again.

MICHAEL PITTMAN JR., INDIANAPOLIS COLTS Credit Pittman for playing through the pain of a fractured back all of last season. It's a sign that minor injuries won't keep him from contributing. It didn't require any surgery, and he's had all offseason to rest.

RASHEE RICE, KANSAS CITY CHIEFS Rice was averaging six catches for 72 yards through four games before suffering a season-ending knee injury. At 25, shouldn't have trouble getting back to full speed (although he could be facing a suspension).

CHRISTIAN WATSON, GREEN BAY PACKERS Watson flashed his big-play potential in limited action last season, but he suffered an ACL injury in Week 18. Since speed is the name of his game, there's little chance he'll be ready for the start of the season. Green Bay used its first-round pick to draft another speedster, Matthew Golden.

ATHLON'S TAKE

There's room for target fluctuation and bad TD luck. But it'll take an injury to Chase or Joe Burrow for him to really let you down.

Chase is not simply coming off the top wide receiver fantasy season of 2024. He also posted the 15th-most PPR points per game ever at the position — 12th-most since the 1970 NFL-AFL merger. You might think Chase benefited from Tee Higgins missing five games, but he actually drew more targets and scored more fantasy points with Higgins in the lineup. It might seem counterintuitive, but the Bengals' offense is bound to be its strongest when the stars are healthy. Expect Cincinnati to remain among the league's most pass-heavy teams.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Nacua has been a beast over his first two seasons. New tag-team partner Davante Adams might actually help create space and opportunities in 2025.

Five wide receivers beat Nacua in expected half-PPR points per game last season. Take away the Week 1 and Week 9 games he left early, though, and Nacua jumps to fourth, behind Ja'Marr Chase, Malik Nabers and new teammate Davante Adams. Nacua has the advantage of history with Matthew Stafford and being eight years younger than Adams. We also probably never got 100% Nacua last year. He entered the season with a knee issue, missed five games and parts of three others and didn't reach 80% playing time in a game until Week 16.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Not much needs to be said about Jefferson himself at this point. As long as his new QB proves at least OK, Jefferson will remain a stud.

Jefferson has finished four straight seasons among the top five receivers in fantasy points per game. He broke through with Kirk Cousins throwing the passes. But Jefferson kept rolling when Minnesota had to turn to Joshua Dobbs, Nick Mullens and Jaren Hall in 2023. And he certainly helped Sam Darnold look good last year. Minnesota clearly liked J.J. McCarthy quite a bit, trading up to take him 10th overall in 2024. And it didn't go crazy in search of a No. 2 QB this offseason.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Collins' size, downfield prowess and still-ascending QB should keep him in WR1 territory as long as he can stay healthy.

Collins appeared on his way to a monster season before a hamstring injury cost him five weeks and slowed his return. He sat among the top two fantasy scorers across formats through four weeks, averaging 122.3 receiving yards per game. We saw that version of Collins in the two playoff contests, and he should be full strength to open 2025. Collins also might get help from the additions of Christian Kirk in the slot and second-round rookie Jayden Higgins on the opposite edge to draw some defensive attention.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Lamb has already shown us No. 1 overall upside. He belongs in the first half of Round 1 in 1-QB leagues with reception scoring.

Lamb has established himself as a target hog, topping 27% target share each of the past three years. Don't worry about George Pickens' arrival hurting. Pickens was not the same type of target earner in Pittsburgh and got traded primarily because of his inconsistent effort and attitude. His speed and playmaking ability on the outside could be a nice complement for Lamb, who runs most of his routes from the slot. A healthy Dak Prescott returns and has worked with Lamb throughout his career.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Russell Wilson, Jaxson Dart and even Jameis Winston would upgrade last year's QB play. Nabers presents as much upside as anyone.

Here's what the Giants' QB situation looked like last year: 10 games of Daniel Jones, five Drew Lock starts, two from Tommy DeVito and part of a game from Tim Boyle. Nabers managed to turn those lemons into the 10th-most half-PPR points per game at the position. And better QB play would have provided more. Pro Football Focus had Nabers second in expected points per game. Russell Wilson shouldn't excite you, but he's still easily better than all those guys. And rookie Jaxson Dart could ramp up deep-ball production.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Brown probably won't be as good a target bet as most other WRs up here. But he's perennially high in yards per catch and TD rate.

Brown has finished each of his three Philly seasons among the top 12 receivers in fantasy points per game. Last year marked his lowest ranking in that span. The issues were a hamstring injury that cost him three early games and the league's most run-heavy offense. Brown played every game the two seasons before, so don't fret about his durability. Philly's probably going to rank among the most run-leaning offenses once again, unless Saquon Barkley gets hurt. Brown's yardage and scoring efficiency help counter that.

ATHLON'S TAKE
London appeared on his way to becoming a stud WR anyway, and Atlanta finally seems to have found him a QB. Treat him as a WR1.

London finished just 15th among receivers in half-PPR points per game last year, but he tied for seventh in expected points per game, according to Pro Football Focus. London took over the pass-catching corps, ranking sixth league-wide among WRs who saw 30-plus targets. He ramped up that fantasy production over quarterback Michael Penix Jr.'s three-game finish, including receiving lines of 7-106 and 10-187-2. That's a small sample, but it at least shows us the potential the two possess for 2025 and beyond.

ATHLON'S TAKE
The threat of Travis Hunter has potential to create space for Thomas. We're not downgrading him unless Hunter proves we should.

Let's hope it was the former Jacksonville coaching staff and not Trevor Lawrence who held Thomas back through two-thirds of last season. With Lawrence through Week 9, Thomas averaged just 3.9 catches per game for 66.1 yards. From Week 10 on, that jumped to 6.5 catches and 85.9 yards per game. Coaching definitely played a role. Thomas didn't reach 80% playing time in a game until Week 9. From then on, he dipped below 84.5% only once. First-round pick Travis Hunter adds a target challenge in 2025.

ATHLON'S TAKE
The injury risk's a legit concern and OK reason to pass on Higgins. If you draft him, just make sure you secure WR insurance.

Higgins might have just put up one of the most frustrating WR1 seasons ever. His scoring average ranked fourth at the position, even with teammate Ja'Marr Chase leading the way. Higgins also lost two games to a hamstring injury and three more to a quad issue. That marked the second straight season in which he missed five contests and third time in four years he has lost multiple games to injury. His contract extension after the season suggests we should bet on the targets staying up where they were in 2024, though.

ATHLON'S TAKE
There's some risk the Chiefs will spread targets around and cut into Rice's target share. If he's the WR1, though, the ceiling rises high.

We've all expected a suspension for Rice since his off-field trouble last offseason. Slow progress through the court system seems likely to push that question off at least another year, though. That leaves Rice just needing to show fantasy managers that he's all the way back from the LCL tear that ended his 2024 season. If he is, Rice could return to a role that had him leading Chiefs targets to open last year. He'll face challenges, though, from Xavier Worthy and Hollywood Brown.

New QB, big WR changes and a new OC ... that combo means a wide range of outcomes for JSN. Feel free to pass on the risk.

JSN improved in basically every category from Year 1 to Year 2. His jumps in route rate and target share pushed him ahead of both Tyler Lockett and DK Metcalf after a rookie season spent as the No. 3. Smith-Njigba also saw more targets per route and posted more yards per route. A deeper average target depth helped. Lockett's departure came as no surprise. Metcalf leaving changes the offense more significantly. Cooper Kupp arrives with a similar skill set to JSN's, but that signing could signal Smith-Njigba will play outside more.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Unless we get negative reports on Hill this summer, we're willing to bet on him one more time. Star WRs have historically remained useful at 31.

Tua Tagovailoa's six games lost to injury (including another concussion) certainly factored into Hill's rough 2024. But how much? Hill slid to 38th among WRs in target share for the season after leading the league in 2023 and ranking second in 2022. He drew the lowest Pro Football Focus receiving grade of his career, along with putting up his fewest yards after catch per reception and yards per route. Miami added nothing meaningful to the pass-catching group. But it's fair to wonder if Hill's simply in decline.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Adams and Puka Nacua are probably at least as good as the Cooper Kupp-Robert Woods combo that scored well together. Adams looks good as a WR2.

It's interesting that the Rams moved on from Cooper Kupp and replaced him with someone six months older. That shows you, though, that they see Adams as still effective. That's certainly fair after he out-targeted Garrett Wilson in their shared time with the Jets. Adams, of course, benefited from playing with Aaron Rodgers there. He has no history with Matthew Stafford. But that should just mean he runs second behind Puka Nacua, in an offense that has long shown us it can support two high-level fantasy wideouts.

ATHLON'S TAKE
The Lions' offense is due for overall TD regression. Don't be afraid to lean away from the highest-priced options.

It's not comfy ranking St. Brown this low, but we can't ignore the changes. First, St. Brown slipped from sixth among WRs in expected half-PPR points per game in 2023 to 12th last season. And he did so despite increasing his expected TDs from 7.3 to 9.8. That accentuates the decline in total opportunities, which coincided with fellow wideout Jameson Williams' breakout, alongside tight end Sam LaPorta and the backfield commanding touches. Add a coordinator change to the crowded offense, and St. Brown is far from a lock to stay in WR1 land.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Evans is OK to pass on if you don't want to risk the age, but Chris Godwin's injury recovery adds upside to Evans' outlook.

As long as no one tells Evans how old he is or how difficult pro football is, we should be good. Despite a three-game hamstring injury in the middle of last season, Evans is coming off his 11th straight year of more than 1,000 receiving yards. He has also scored double-digit TDs in four of the past five seasons, showing the value of quality QB play. Evans turns 32 just ahead of this season, which has historically been a year of decline risk at the position. Davante Adams proved last year that 32 isn't a dead end, though.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Wilson has a shot to lead the entire league in target share this year. There's WR1-level upside, but his scoring average hasn't found that range yet.

Wilson set a career high in fantasy points per game with the Aaron Rodgers QB upgrade last year. But the midseason arrival of Davante Adams kept him from maximizing the impact. Adams out-targeted Wilson over their time together. Should we just chalk that up to Adams' familiarity with Rodgers, or should we worry that a 24-year-old Wilson couldn't earn more targets than Adams, who turned 32 in December? Either way, Adams is now gone. Justin Fields doesn't match Rodgers as a passer but supported good numbers for DJ Moore in Chicago.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Moore is the only proven producer among Bears receivers and is still just 28. He's a good bet anywhere in WR2 range and across formats.

Moore's first two years in Chicago have found him finishing seventh in fantasy scoring with Justin Fields as his QB and then checking in 16th with a poor-performing Caleb Williams plus extra target competition. Keenan Allen's gone now, and Williams should be better in his second season. New head coach Ben Johnson led a high-powered Lions offense the past three years and adds hope. But there are also new target challenges. Chicago drafted tight end Colston Loveland and wide receiver Luther Burden III to join second-year wideout Rome Odunze.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Smith has been a high-efficiency performer throughout his young career. That said, the low-volume risk makes him OK to pass on here.

At first glance, Smith looks like a strong candidate to regress to the mean. He ranked 17th among WRs in half-PPR points per game despite tying for just 40th in expected points per game. The main issue there was the Eagles passing on just 44.3% of offensive plays. That was down 10 percentage points vs. the year before and at least 4.5 points vs. any of Jalen Hurts' three previous starting seasons. Philly's likely to throw the ball at least a little more in 2025. How much more could dramatically impact the WR scoring.

McConkey should be good in 2025, but he's expensive in drafts. Feel free to skip over him and take rookie Tre Harris later.

McConkey enjoyed a terrific rookie season by any measure. His production really ramped up over the second half, though, when the Chargers started throwing more. The team went from a 50.8% pass rate in neutral situations through the first six weeks to 58.3% the rest of the way. McConkey went from 3.8 catches and 43.8 yards per game over the first span to 5.7 and 84.5 from Week 7 on. But did the Chargers import Najee Harris and Omarion Hampton to lean back toward the run? Probably to some degree.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Reed's a boom/bust play at this level. The good news: You won't need to draft him this early after he disappointed in 2024.

Part of the reason Reed sits this high is his rushing. He has added 46.2 fantasy points in that area through two seasons. The risk in putting him up here: Reed lost receiving volume last year, from 4.0 receptions per game as a rookie to 3.2. Part of the issue is Green Bay's committee WR approach that spreads targets around. But the Packers also leaned hard on the run over the second half of last season. Jordan Love was dealing with multiple injuries, and Josh Jacobs was running well. We're projecting some correction toward the pass.

Olave was going in a riskier range the past two years. He's sliding much later after letting 2024 managers down. He's a high-upside WR3.

Olave's career is running similarly to that of college teammate Garrett Wilson. Like the Jet, Olave has dealt with quarterback woes for three years. Also like Wilson, Olave watched a teammate steal more target share in 2024 than anyone predicted ahead of the year. There's room for Olave and Rashid Shaheed to coexist, but New Orleans now has a big QB question. If rookie Tyler Shough is ready, his big arm and mobility could be a particularly nice fit for the Saints' pair of speedy, young outside receivers.

BYE WEEK: 7
ATHLON'S TAKE
Flowers is a bet both on an ascending young player and a perennially strong offense. He's not a "must," but there's upside.

Lamar Jackson's outlandishly efficient passing season — league-high 8.6% TD rate and 8.8 yards per attempt — makes it easy to overlook that Baltimore sported the league's second-most run-heavy offense. They tend to rank in that range, but 2024's 47.5% pass rate was low even for them. Sheer luck — be it Derrick Henry's health, trailing in more games, or something else — is likely to push that at least a bit back toward the pass. Flowers has done well in catch rate and yardage but hasn't had any TD luck despite Baltimore's high scoring.

ATHLON'S TAKE
McLaurin would be a nice high-WR3 pick, but he's far more likely to go in mid-WR2 range. There's more risk than upside from that level.

McLaurin scored a TD on 6.6% of his receptions across his first five NFL seasons. Last year, he scored on 15.9%. Sure, Jayden Daniels' arrival was good news for Washington's lead receiver — and should continue to be so. But McLaurin's not going to stay in that range year to year. His 13 TDs vs. 7.7 expected TDs marked the largest gap for any player last season, according to Pro Football Focus. Even with the 13th-most expected TDs, McLaurin tied for just 29th among WRs in expected half-PPR points per game.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Waddle's terrible 2024 has him going well into WR3 territory this year. He's a much easier buy — with more upside — than he was last summer.

Like Tyreek Hill, Waddle posted career lows in multiple categories last year. Unlike Hill, Waddle doesn't bring age concern. Waddle won't turn 27 until late November. He hit 20% or higher in target share each of the previous two years before dipping to 16.5% over his 14 full games in 2024. Waddle — who set the since-broken rookie reception record in 2021 — remains too talented a player to not figure out for 2025. He went from topping 70 receiving yards per game in each of head coach Mike McDaniel's first two seasons to just 49.6 last year.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Harrison remains a big-time talent, and Cardinals coaches still say good things about him. He's a breakout candidate if he comes at a decent price.

Harrison's rookie year wasn't as bad as it seemed. It just looked worse vs. the rousing successes of classmates Malik Nabers, Brian Thomas Jr. and Ladd McConkey. His 11.7 PPR points per game, though, bested the rookie-year averages of fellow first-round NFL Draft picks DeVonta Smith, Calvin Johnson, Drake London, DeAndre Hopkins and Jaxon Smith-Njigba. The last guy provides a recent example of a player going from just-OK debut season to breakthrough second year — even in a lackluster offense.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Meyers is going to go later than he should in your PPR league, unless you take it upon yourself to do the right thing and draft him.

Meyers finished last season 24th among WRs in PPR points per game. After the Davante Adams trade (from Week 8 on), Meyers climbed to 19th in points per game and 11th in expected points per game, according to Pro Football Focus. That still found him behind tight end Brock Bowers, who figures to remain the top target. The biggest competition added, though, was Round 2 wide receiver Jack Bech. The rookie had a strong pre-draft season but up-and-down production in college. Meyers comes off career highs in catches and yards.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Ridley probably doesn't have top-12 upside for the season. But he could deliver consistent receptions this year and be a weekly redraft starter.

Ridley headed toward the offseason as the easy No. 1 target in Tennessee. Then he watched the Titans draft QB Cam Ward first overall and add only this competition at receiver: veteran Tyler Lockett and a pair of fourth-round picks in Chimere Dike and Elic Ayomanor. We don't want to overrate the target share for Ridley, who hasn't been a high-end target earner in his career. But he's in good shape to set a personal best.

Daniel Jones isn't exciting but has supported more WR value than Anthony Richardson to date. He'd likely be good for Downs.

Downs should hope that Daniel Jones wins the QB job for the Colts. Jones' starting stint with the Giants found slot types such as Golden Tate, Evan Engram, Sterling Shepard, Darren Waller and Wan'Dale Robinson operating as favorite targets. Jones' 6.5-yard career average target depth would fit nicely with Indy's slot man, who already passed Michael Pittman Jr. in target share last year. Downs also beat Pittman last season in expected touchdowns, expected PPR points per game and yards per route.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Betting on the talent with Samuel is worth the modest risk as long as he keeps lingering in low WR3 territory.

Samuel joins a Washington offense with clear opportunity but less obvious work projections. Terry McLaurin's 117 targets in 2024 beat his nearest teammate (Zach Ertz) by 26. They beat the next wide receiver by 53. And Washington ranked just 25th in pass attempts with a rookie quarterback. Jayden Daniels' performance should motivate more passing, and the trade for Samuel would seem to support that. We'll see about his rushing role away from 49ers head coach Kyle Shanahan's system, but Samuel could siphon some carries from an aging Austin Ekeler.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Metcalf obviously carries upside well beyond this, but it's still not a great offense for WRs. George Pickens ranked 45th in points per game last year.

The Steelers traded a second-round pick for Metcalf, gave him a $30 million a year contract and then traded away his biggest competitor for targets (George Pickens). Metcalf's in excellent shape to grab a larger share of targets than he's used to. Pickens ranked 15th among WRs (adjusted for games missed) in that category last season. Metcalf has reached that high only once (eighth in 2021) after finishing 17th in 2020. Those seasons found Metcalf ranking 11th and sixth, respectively, in total half-PPR points.

McMillan has a frame for end-zone targets and the route-running of a smaller guy. He's attractive right away in WR3 range.

After the Panthers drafted McMillan eighth overall, head coach Dave Canales praised his route precision and 6-foot-5 frame that's built for red-zone use. The rookie hits an offense with an immediate need. No Panther reached 50 catches in 2024. Xavier Legette led in targets and receptions despite putting forth a lackluster debut. Adam Thielen remained the most reliable wideout in his age-34 season. Barring a wildly disappointing camp, McMillan will open the year as the starting "X" receiver and lead target.

It's primarily up to Pickens how this goes. Don't expect to get a discount, but he's an upside shot in the second half of WR3 territory.

Cowboys COO Stephen Jones said on SiriusXM after the trade: "He reminds a lot in our building of Dez Bryant in terms of his competitiveness, what he brings to the field, his edge." The wrong kind of edge got Pickens booted from Pittsburgh. But Pickens joins a Dallas offense that ranked sixth-most pass-heavy in the league last year, despite losing Dak Prescott for half the year. If he behaves, Pickens could team with CeeDee Lamb to form one of the league's better receiver duos.

Addison's going later in drafts this year than he did last, despite extremely similar production. That makes him a solid-to-good value.

Addison still has a trial pending for his July 2024 DUI, so watch for fallout from that. On the field, he has delivered. Addison finished 20th among receivers in half-PPR formats in each of his first two seasons. A high touchdown rate presents strong regression potential. But Addison also climbed from 37th in expected half-PPR points per game in 2023 to 27th last season, according to Pro Football Focus. We'll see about J.J. McCarthy. Addison has thus far dealt with Sam Darnold, Joshua Dobbs, Nick Mullens and Jaren Hall, though.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Be wary of that low target share for Williams. He'd best fit as a WR4 but will probably go earlier. He's more valuable in best-ball leagues.

Williams broke out with a top-20 fantasy finish in his third season, but it was a little fragile. He tied for 40th in targets, tied for 42nd in receptions, ranked 21st in yards and tied for 18th in touchdown catches. That tells you to be wary of the work share but aware that Williams delivers above-average efficiency on yardage and TDs. The touchdowns can be unpredictable, but Williams' speed will keep him a big-play threat. This year brings the added challenge of integrating a new offensive coordinator.

Worthy's getting a huge bump from his playoff production and offensive situation. He's being drafted at least at his ceiling, if not above it.

Worthy enjoyed a strong finish to his rookie year, with touchdowns in four of the final five games (including the playoffs). But he spent most of his rookie year seeing light target volume and posting modest receiving yardage. Worthy didn't reach five catches in a game until Week 13. He then caught five-plus in eight straight going through the playoffs. The Chiefs get Rashee Rice back from a knee injury and should get a healthier version of Hollywood Brown, who lost nearly all of last season to a shoulder injury.

Kupp's numbers last year, plus the Rams quitting on him, plus joining a team with a slot WR and meh QB equals no thanks on the veteran.

Kupp's at least making $17.5 million for a year with Seattle. That signing came after the Rams dumped him in favor of a guy six months older (Davante Adams). That makes Seattle's decision a little iffy, especially when you consider that Kupp brings a skill set similar to Jaxon Smith-Njigba's. We'll trust new Seahawks offensive coordinator Klint Kubiak and the long coaching record of his family to fit them together. Kupp, though, comes off the two worst Pro Football Focus receiving grades and two lowest yards-per-route rates of his career.

Sutton's actually being drafted later than where he finished last season. That makes him a fine bet, even if you're not sold on a repeat.

Sutton set career highs in total fantasy points, points per game, targets and receptions last season, in Bo Nix's first year. His catch rate dipped vs. 2023, but that just made it align with his previous rates. Sutton's biggest challenge for 2025 could be tight end Evan Engram, who finished second and first in targets for the Jaguars the past two years. Engram's a short-range worker at this point, though, and should be more complementary than challenging to Sutton's role. Third-round wide receiver Pat Bryant arrives as well.

Odunze still has the upside to emerge as the clear No. 2 WR for the Bears. But he stands a better chance of seeing his targets capped now.

Odunze opened the offseason with intriguing upside, as the Bears elected not to bring back veteran Keenan Allen. But they drafted tight end Colston Loveland and then wide receiver Luther Burden III in the first two rounds. Odunze looks like a better bet to maintain a top-two role at receiver for the team. But the 2024 first-round pick arrived under the previous regime. We'll have to see what new head coach Ben Johnson thinks of Odunze vs. Burden. Jennings finished 2024 inside the top 30. He would have ranked barely top 50 without the monster game. He's appropriately priced.

The 49ers told us Jennings was probably headed for more when they extended him at nearly $12 million over two years last May. San Francisco could have returned the WR on just a one-year restricted free-agent tender, and Jennings hadn't topped 35 receptions or 416 yards to that point. He didn't come close to matching the 11-175-3 breakout line of Week 3 last year but did draw 10-plus targets four other times and snag seven or more receptions five times. Jennings is competing with Ricky Pearsall and a recovering Brandon Aiyuk.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Godwin's a nice value at ADP if he's fully recovered by the season and playing his usual role. The recovery adds some downside risk, though.

Godwin dislocated his left ankle in the Week 7 loss to Baltimore. The Bucs indicated with his three-year extension at more than $20 million per year that they're not worried about the joint long-term. But Godwin's recovery will at least bear watching in the buildup to this season. Before the injury, he sat third among WRs in half-PPR points per game. Godwin likely would have been headed for some regression from that spot, though. He ranked just 18th at the position in expected points per game

Pittman finished three straight seasons among the top 22 fantasy wide-outs before last year. There's upside with better QB play.

Pittman slid behind teammate Josh Downs last season in targets per game, receptions, expected TDs, expected fantasy points per game and yards per route. Pittman probably wouldn't be as good a fit as Downs with Daniel Jones. Jones' short ADOT has favored many a slot receiver and tight end through the years. But any improvement in QB accuracy will be good for both Colts receivers.

EFP: 149.0

ATHLON'S TAKE

Don't overrate that small sample with Michael Penix Jr. for either Falcons WR going forward. But Drake London does stand as the clear lead.

Mooney landed in WR3 territory despite poor play from quarterback Kirk Cousins for most of the Atlanta debut for both players. Mooney started out scoring even higher than that, ranking well inside WR2 territory for much of the year. But regression caught up during a season that found him finished tied for 49th in expected fantasy points per game. Mooney's 2025 outlook likely sits closer to that.

EFP: 148.9

ATHLON'S TAKE

Shaheed carries a boom/bust weekly profile, but he's going late enough in drafts that the boom half of that will be worth chasing.

Through five healthy weeks together to open last season, Shaheed led Chris Olave in targets, receiving yards, touchdowns, yards per target (9.9) and yards per catch (17.8). He had 5.3 yards on his teammate in that last category. Shaheed's meniscus tear shouldn't be an issue for 2025. QB play could be, though. New Orleans hopes second-round pick Tyler Shough is ready. If he is, Shough's big arm and tall stature could blend nicely with Shaheed's skills.

BYE WEEK: 14

ATHLON'S TAKE

Aiyuk hasn't been a high-volume guy, relying more on efficiency. That makes his recovery even more important.

Aiyuk has a clear path to leading San Francisco in receiving. The biggest obstacle will be the knee that's recovering from a 2024 ACL tear. The team's not sure he'll be ready for the start of the season. When Aiyuk's knee is ready, he'll compete with Jauan Jennings and Ricky Pearsall for target share in the wake of Deebo Samuel's trade to Washington. Christian McCaffrey should be ready to factor heavily into the target distribution as well.

BYE WEEK: 14

ATHLON'S TAKE

Expect Diggs to be closer to his 10.6 yards per catch from Houston than to his career rate of 12.2 yards per catch. There's volume upside.

Be careful not to read Diggs' $63.5 million contract with the Patriots as a guarantee that he'll be all the way back from his 2024 ACL tear by the start of September. The contract includes a clause that his guaranteed money does not apply to any "aggravation or re-injury" of the right knee that ended his lone Texans season prematurely. If Diggs is ready to go, he'll find a needy New England offense and carry the potential to dominate targets.

EFP: 140.7

BYE WEEK: 6

ATHLON'S TAKE

If Kirk can hold off rookie Jayden Higgins for the No. 2 role in targets, there's usable fantasy potential here — especially in PPR leagues.

The Texans are paying Kirk around $16.5 million for the final year of his contract. That level of investment likely locks him into a primary slot role — and perhaps the overall No. 2 wide receiver role. Stefon Diggs nearly matched Nico Collins' team lead in targets per game as last year's slot leader. Diggs' eight targets per contest would be the highest mark for Kirk since his second season in Arizona.

50 RICKY PEARSALL

6-1/189/AGE: 25

EFP: 140.6

ATHLON'S TAKE

Pearsall will be especially interesting if Brandon Aiyuk opens the season on the sideline. We'll see if he's fantasy-viable when Aiyuk's healthy.

Pearsall arrived as a somewhat surprising late first-round pick. A gunshot wound just before the season slowed his start, and it wasn't until the final three weeks that we got consecutive games of 70% playing time or more for the rookie. That span included Pearsall's only two games of more than four catches. He'll open 2025 at least among the top three and perhaps without Brandon Aiyuk vying for early targets coming off an ACL tear. Pearsall showed some inside-outside versatility as a rookie and worked deeper (11.3 ADOT), like Aiyuk.

EFP: 137.0

ATHLON'S TAKE

Brown vs. Xavier Worthy will be the primary battle for fantasy worth. We're betting on Worthy there, but Brown's much cheaper in drafts.

Brown basically had his 2024 wiped out by a shoulder injury. He did return for a limited role late in the season and through the playoffs, drawing a decent 15 targets over the final two regular-season games. Brown returns on a one-year deal to compete with Xavier Worthy and Rashee Rice for targets. He'll likely trail Rice — perhaps by a decent margin — after Rice closed 2023 as the lead target and seemed to open 2024 in the same role.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Egbuka looks like one of the most attractive handcuff types at WR. He'll carry plenty of upside if Chris Godwin or Mike Evans goes down.

Egbuka doesn't have obvious opportunity with the Bucs. But he does go to an offense that saw each of its top two wide receivers lose time to injury in 2024. Chris Godwin's coming off a dislocated ankle, and his recovery will bear watching. Egbuka's game could make him a direct replacement for Godwin should the veteran miss time. Mike Evans has missed multiple games two of the past three years. Egbuka comes off a strong Ohio State career that saw his precision route-running play especially well for slot-type work.

EFP: 127.3

ATHLON'S TAKE

Golden's draft capital gives him upside in that Green Bay should play him plenty. But don't overrate the prospect on that factor.

Before selecting Golden, the Packers hadn't drafted a Round 1 receiver since Javon Walker in 2002. That tells us how much they like the new wideout, but there are some causes for concern. First, Golden never led his college team in receptions across two years at Houston and one at Texas. We can excuse him not beating an established Tank Dell as a Houston freshman, but the other two years look more suspicious. Golden lands in an offense that likes to spread the targets around. That could limit his weekly usability.

6-1/185/AGE: 22

EFP: 125.3

ATHLON'S TAKE

The biggest question with Hunter will be just how much offensive playing time he gets. That adds risk to drafting him in starter range.

Jacksonville traded a 2026 first-round pick (and more) to get Hunter at No. 2 overall. We'll never know exactly how he'd have been valued as just a receiver, but the Jaguars have said all along that they view him as a wideout first. Going to an offense under new head coach Liam Coen's stewardship could mean Hunter plays a role similar to what Chris Godwin did last year in Tampa Bay with Coen as offensive coordinator, spending about 60% of his time in the slot and running the shortest ADOT of his career (5.6 yards).

55 KEON COLEMAN

6-3/213/AGE: 22

EFP: 120.4

ATHLON'S TAKE

Going in WR5 range of drafts makes Coleman all upside in a Bills pass-catching corps that looks fluid in its target distribution.

A fairly quiet rookie season found Coleman faring well in yards after the catch and end-zone opportunities (eight, tops among Bills). The latter's not surprising for a 6-foot-4, early Round 2 pick. The former could really boost his fantasy production if it continues. A wide receiver who runs deeper routes — as Coleman does — typically rates lower in yards after catch, while shorter-range receivers load up more in that area. If Coleman's catching longer passes and tacking on yardage afterward, he could be an efficient scorer.

56 WAN'DALE ROBINSON

EFP: 119.9

ATHLON'S TAKE

Robinson will be fine as a PPR WR4 if he maintains his role. He's not worth chasing hard or clinging to in the leadup, though.

Be honest — aren't you surprised to see how many passes Robinson caught last season? He tied for 10th among WRs in targets — even with Malik Nabers ranking second — and sat alone at 10th in receptions. Yardage? 44th. Combine that with the meager TD total, and you get the WR57 in half-PPR points per game. Robinson will continue to trail Nabers but could remain No. 2 in targets with better quarterback play.

EFP: 114.4

ATHLON'S TAKE

Coker has potential to play the slot or outside and will bear watching for a WR2-type role. Tetairoa McMillan's no lock to dominate targets right away.

Coker overcame going undrafted and losing most of the summer to hamstring issues, and he posted a more impressive rookie season than first-round classmate Xavier Legette. The latter led in season totals, but Coker beat Legette in catch rate, yards per target, yards per catch and team yardage share over the time they shared the field. That's all particularly impressive because Legette had every reason to carry more favor with coaches. Tetairoa McMillan's arrival lowers the ceiling for any other Carolina wide receiver's 2025 outlook.

ATHLON'S TAKE

McCloud has spent his seven-year career being a better return man than receiver. If he's heavily involved on offense, that's bad news for Atlanta.

McCloud caught 23 more passes than in any previous pro season, improving on his previous high in receptions per game by 50%. McCloud's 11.1 yards per catch and one touchdown on those receptions mitigated the impact. And his targets evaporated when Michael Penix Jr. stepped in (12 over three games). We'll see what McCloud looks like with more games of Penix, but he shouldn't factor heavily into this offense.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Johnston's a good bet to emerge as the No. 3 receiver, but that's probably not a strong role for fantasy in the Chargers' offense.

Johnston improved in his second season. But was it enough? His 3.7 receptions and 47.4 yards per game marked big jumps from his rookie numbers. But they're not impressive for a former first-round pick, especially as a second-round rookie (Ladd McConkey) zoomed by him. Johnston now must compete with another second-round wide receiver picked by head coach Jim Harbaugh's staff (they inherited Johnston). Tre Harris arrives off an SEC career that displayed upside on deep balls and after the catch.

ATHLON'S TAKE

Lazard might pop for a week here or there, but he combines lackluster production with injury risk. Not an attractive combo.

If Lazard runs a route and Aaron Rodgers isn't in the pocket, does Lazard's route even count? The veteran managed just 3.1 catches per game in his 2024 on-field reunion with Rodgers, but that boosted Lazard's numbers across the board vs. his 2023 Jets debut. Now in his age-30 season, Lazard likely doesn't factor heavily into anyone's plans. He has just one season of more than 3.3 receptions or 45.1 receiving yards per game.

Cooper's likely beyond operating as a lead receiver, but he's also not yet too old to re-emerge for some decent production and usable weeks.

Cooper barely showed up in Buffalo after his trade from the Browns and then watched the Bills opt for Joshua Palmer in free agency. It was just 2023 when Cooper posted a career high 17.4 yards per catch and landed 17th among wide receivers in fantasy points per game. He heads into his age-31 season coming off a career-low 1.41 yards per route, despite a still-deep 12.3-yard average depth of target.

Doubs is likely to remain a TD-or-bust play. We'll see whether his role changes, but head coach Matt LaFleur has been a fan of the WR.

Doubs has relied heavily on touchdowns for his fantasy scoring, finding the end zone on 10.2% of his receptions. He has actually crept up in target share through three seasons, going from a No. 57 rank among WRs in 2022 to 54th and then 47th. He'll face a new challenge after Green Bay drafted Matthew Golden in Round 1. Of course, there's room for Golden to take over Christian Watson's role after Watson went down with an ACL tear late last season.

ATHLON'S TAKE

We're not betting on breakout upside for Wilson, but he could get interesting for fantasy if Marvin Harrison Jr. goes down.

The Cardinals were a prime spot for a rookie wideout to land, but the team spent no picks on the position. That returns Wilson as the likely No. 2 WR, trailing Marvin Harrison Jr. and Trey McBride for targets. That doesn't point to exciting upside. Wilson finished his first two seasons just 74th and 77th among wide receivers in target share. McBride and Harrison figure to dominate that area again. But Wilson has the size and speed to keep improving what he does with his chances.

64 CEDRIC TILLMAN

6-3/215/AGE: 25

ATHLON'S TAKE

If he's merely the No. 3 receiver for a Browns team with one of the league's worst QB situations, then Tillman won't be worth much attention.

Many expected the Browns to address quarterback earlier. Instead, they traded down, drafted a defensive tackle and waited until Rounds 3 and 5 for QB. That makes Tillman a mild winner, though the team followed the draft by signing Diontae Johnson to a one-year deal. If Johnson's in a good mood, he's at least the second-best wide receiver on the team — and perhaps No. 1. Tillman brings intriguing physical gifts — including a 6-foot-3 frame — but has done little outside of a nice stretch with Jameis Winston.

EFP: 106.1

ATHLON'S TAKE

Harris looks like the favorite for the No. 2 receiver role with the Chargers and could prove fantasy-viable right away. Stash him late.

Harris arrives to a Chargers offense that needs another target and just provided fertile ground for a less proven second-round wide receiver a year ago. Ladd McConkey arrived with questions about whether he could stay healthy and what his full-season production would look like. Harris earned strong market shares across five years in college — including two at Ole Miss. He led the nation with 128.8 receiving yards per game last year and averaged 17.7 yards per catch and 100.8 yards per game over two SEC seasons.

66 DONTAYVION WICKS

6-1/206/AGE: 24

EFP: 105.0

ATHLON'S TAKE

Wicks is a decent end of draft stash in a spread-it-around passing game with handcuff upside to multiple Green Bay receivers.

Wicks had a path to a regular role when Christian Watson tore an ACL. The Round 1 selection of Matthew Golden complicated that, but we'll see how Green Bay sorts its wide receivers. Head coach Matt LaFleur is willing to sit a draft pick. Quarterback Jordan Love spent two years on the sideline, and even running back Derrick Henry split work with Dion Lewis when LaFleur was his offensive coordinator in Tennessee. Wicks has flashed upside when he gets onto the field but has also struggled with drops.

67 PARKER WASHINGTON

EFP: 104.8

ATHLON'S TAKE

There's nothing exciting about Washington, who's no lock for a meaningful role. We'll see how Jacksonville sorts the depth chart.

Washington could hit the season as Jacksonville's most frequent slot receiver. That will likely depend on how the Jags deploy Travis Hunter. If they play the rookie like the Bucs did Chris Godwin when Liam Coen was his coordinator, then Hunter could be headed for about 60% of his time spent in the slot. Dyami Brown is on hand to line up outside in that scenario. If Hunter plays outside, then Washington could run the slot. He had three six-catch games as a Christian Kirk fill-in over the past two years.

68 TUTU ATWELL

5-9/165/AGE: 25

EFP: 103.2

ATHLON'S TAKE

The Rams' actions around Atwell this offseason said maybe we should pay attention, and then that we probably shouldn't.

The Rams re-signed Atwell on a one-year, $10 million deal just before he would have hit free agency. That tells us Atwell wasn't headed for a particularly good market and wanted one more shot to "prove it" in a friendly environment. The Rams still figure to work in Atwell as the No. 3 wideout, but it's tough to find him enough targets with Davante Adams and Puka Nacua around. Round 2 tight end Terrance Ferguson might also cut into Atwell's time.

69 JOSHUA PALMER

6-1/210/AGE: 25

EFP: 103.0

ATHLON'S TAKE

Palmer's OK, and Josh Allen's very good. The latter stands the better chance of making Palmer relevant. He's a fine late stack with Allen.

Landing with Josh Allen on a $15 million-a-year contract is a good place to be. Palmer's career 11.5-yard ADOT could prove especially fitting, working him in a different area of the field vs. Khalil Shakir and tight end Dalton Kincaid. But the contract and landing spot don't take Palmer from limited player across four years with the Chargers and make him a potential fantasy stud. He has managed just 3.1 receptions per game so far, peaking at 4.5 back in his second season before declining to 2.6 with last year's Chargers.

70 MARVIN MIMS JR.

EFP: 102.8

ATHLON'S TAKE

Mims looks fine as a late pick for a best-ball roster. But he doesn't appear on track for a role that will allow you to confidently start him in fantasy.

Mims has spent two years with head coach Sean Payton since arriving as the first pick (in Round 2) of the Payton era in Denver. Over those 34 games (including playoffs), Mims has reached 50% playing time in just three contests: the playoff loss at Buffalo and two 2023 contests. Mims flashed for a pair of 100-yard games and two multi-TD outings late last season, but his role remained limited. Denver added Round 3 wide receiver Pat Bryant. Troy Franklin and DeVaughn Vele each played more snaps than Mims as 2024 rookies.

BYE WEEK: 14

ATHLON'S TAKE

Slayton's best fantasy value would come from Malik Nabers missing time. He caught 14 of 22 targets in the two 2024 games Nabers missed.

It was a bit surprising to see Slayton get $36 million over three years from the Giants. It was also a bit surprising to see him get less money than the Bills gave Josua Palmer. Slayton could benefit from the quarterback changes. Out are short-range Daniel Jones and every garbage fill-in who followed him last year. In are Russell Wilson — who has always thrown one of the league's prettiest deep balls — and Jaxson Dart, who's not afraid to sling it downfield.

72 KEENAN ALLEN

EFP: 100.5

BYE WEEK: TBD

ATHLON'S TAKE

Allen remained solid through an age-32 season that's historically unkind to the position. He can stay relevant at 33.

Allen narrowly trailed DJ Moore in targets per game in their lone season together with the Bears. Allen posted a career-low 1.36 yards per route, though — likely due in part to the inconsistent (and often poor) play of rookie quarterback Caleb Williams. Allen managed a WR37 finish, scoring right at his expected touchdown number and short of his expected fantasy points per game overall. He fits better at this stage as a shorter-range chains-mover.

73 JACK BECH

6-1/214/AGE: 22

EFP: 97.7

ATHLON'S TAKE

Bech looks interesting as a late option in redraft. Just don't reach too far in drafts where the rookie hype runs stronger.

As a true freshman in 2021, Bech snagged the most receptions for an LSU team that also sported Malik Nabers, Brian Thomas Jr. and Trey Palmer. He then endured a down couple of years but reemerged for a strong final year at TCU. That included 16.7 yards per catch and nine of the team's 31 touchdown receptions (31%). Bech's Raiders return tight end Brock Bowers and underrated wide receiver Jakobi Meyers, but there's plenty of room for a third target to emerge. Bech brings inside-outside versatility and crisp route-running.

BYE WEEK: 9

ATHLON'S TAKE

Johnson needs to prove he's ready to play nice, and Cleveland needs to show how much it'll play him. Johnson's a good late stash, though.

Johnson carries the best target-earning history of any receiver in Cleveland. Of course, if his story were only about his talent and production, then he'd still be playing for a different team. Instead, Johnson motivated four franchises to move on from him in 2024. And he managed only a small, one-year deal with the Browns. He could emerge as the No. 2 wideout here — perhaps even challenge Jerry Jeudy's lead.

75 RASHOD BATEMAN

6-1/195/AGE: 25

EFP: 92.5

ATHLON'S TAKE

Bateman's best deployed as a best-ball WR, where we can take the big plays and not worry about the goose eggs. He'll frustrate otherwise.

Bateman enjoyed a terrific fourth season, but there was a mirage aspect to it. He scored on 20% of his 45 receptions for the season. By comparison, he scored on 4.3% of his career receptions before last year. Bateman also didn't see meaningful growth in his volume. His 2.6 receptions per game beat 2023 but remained short of his rookie-year peak (3.8). Bateman faces a new target challenge from DeAndre Hopkins in 2025.

(MIN 30 TARGETS, INCLUDING PLAYOFFS)

For wide receivers and tight ends, ADOT removes volatile YAC (yards after catch) from the equation, instead focusing only on the average distance the player is downfield on each target. It's an indicator of big-play potential.

INJURY CONCERNS

JAKE FERGUSON, DALLAS COWBOYS Ferguson emerged as a valuable weapon for the Cowboys in 2023, but he took a step back last season, and injuries played a part. Ferguson has also missed time in two of his three NFL seasons with concussions, so that's an ongoing risk.

DALLAS GOEDERT, PHILADELPHIA EAGLES Goedert has been a key weapon in the Eagles' high-powered offense, but he had trouble staying on the field last season. He's missed 15 games in the last three seasons, including seven games last season with foot and hamstring injuries. His 2024 numbers — 42 receptions for 496 yards and two touchdowns — were all the lowest totals for Goedert since his 2018 rookie season.

TYLER HIGBEE, LOS ANGELES RAMS The 32-year-old Higbee missed most of the 2024 season recovering from knee surgery. Even after returning for the final three games of the season, he missed some time with a chest injury. His value is evident, as he caught a touchdown pass in the Rams' close loss to the Philadelphia Eagles in the divisional playoff game, but the Rams did draft fellow tight end Terrance Ferguson in the second round.

THEO JOHNSON, NEW YORK GIANTS Johnson was an unknown quantity when he joined the Giants as a fourth-round rookie last season, but the sudden retirement of Darren Waller and an injury to Daniel Bellinger pressed him into duty. Johnson progressed slowly and then missed the last five games of the season with a Lisfranc injury. He finished the season with 29 catches for 331 yards and one score.

GEORGE KITTLE, SAN FRANCISCO 49ERS Kittle is one of the most productive tight ends in the NFL, but he turns 32 in October. He didn't miss any games en route to catching 78 passes for 1,106 yards and eight touchdowns last season, but he was banged up — he was listed as questionable or doubtful for five weeks with hamstring, ribs, foot and ankle injuries.

LUKE MUSGRAVE, GREEN BAY PACKERS Even after missing a few games as a rookie in 2023 with a kidney injury, Musgrave was the starting tight end for Green Bay when the 2024 season began. But he actually lost his job to Tucker Kraft before suffering an ankle injury in Week 5. The ankle injury persisted, and he'll have to overcome the injury history if he has any chance of taking playing time back from Kraft.

DAVID NJOKU, CLEVELAND BROWNS With so much uncertainty at the quarterback spot for Cleveland, Njoku will be relied on heavily, whether that's providing a target for veteran Joe Flacco or one of the two rookies they drafted. Njoku can be more than a safety valve, but he needs to stay healthy. In 2024, Njoku missed three games with an ankle injury and three others due to a knee.

ATHLON'S TAKE
McBride led all tight ends in target share by a decent margin last year. Brock Bowers looks like his only competition for 2025.

McBride became just the third player in NFL history to reach 100 receptions while catching two TD passes or fewer. He ranked third among tight ends in fantasy points per game, even while scoring under his expected fantasy points, according to Pro Football Focus. Chalk it up primarily to bad luck. McBride caught just one of nine end-zone targets. Only one other tight end exceeded five end-zone targets without scoring at least once. McBride looks like the best bet to lead the Cardinals in targets again, with Marvin Harrison Jr. the only challenger.

ATHLON'S TAKE
The only real question is whether Bowers will be worth how early you'll need to take him. Late Round 2 on should be OK.

Bowers set the NFL record for receptions by a rookie (across positions), despite ranking just third among tight ends in target share. There's room for growth even without expanding that target share. Bowers' 6.6-yard average target depth trailed two of his three college seasons, according to Pro Football Focus. And his 5.3 yards after catch per reception trailed all three of his Georgia campaigns. Bowers should get better quarterback play from Geno Smith in 2025. There's the challenge of adapting to new offensive coordinator Chip Kelly's scheme.

ATHLON'S TAKE
LaPorta was simply overdrafted last year, with downside risk on his role and efficiency. He's appropriately priced here.

What happened to LaPorta after such a strong debut? His targets fell. LaPorta went from ranking seventh among tight ends as a rookie to just 13th last year, even adjusted for games missed. The Lions also passed less, dipping from 56.0% pass in 2023 to 52.2% last season. LaPorta did fare well with what he got, though, boosting his yards per catch vs. 2023 and scoring on 11.7% of his receptions — nearly identical to his 2023 rate. This season brings the challenge of a new offensive coordinator plus the incumbent target competition. But LaPorta's primary red-zone role should help his efficiency.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Njoku has become the short-range safety outlet over the past three years. That should keep him especially attractive in full-PPR leagues.

Njoku has climbed the tight end target rankings each of the past four years. He went from 28th in target share in 2020, to 23rd, 10th, sixth, and then fifth last season. Cleveland trading Amari Cooper helped the available targets, while quarterback Jameis Winston boosted everyone's receiving lines after Deshaun Watson (and Dorian Thompson-Robinson) went down. Njoku is in the final year of a hefty contract but is only 29. We'll see whether the quarterback play can improve, but Njoku has succeeded despite the revolving door at QB.

ATHLON'S TAKE
As long as Kittle doesn't creep into the top three in ADP at the position, he'll make for an attractive option in the mid-single-digit rounds.

Deebo Samuel, Brandon Aiyuk and Christian McCaffrey all lost time to injuries last year. That helped Kittle to his most receptions and yards per game since 2020. The tight end has posted two of his top three yards-per-catch rates the past two years as well. This year's offense finds a questionable Aiyuk coming off an ACL tear, Samuel gone and Jauan Jennings and Ricky Pearsall trying to prove they can be regular factors. Kittle figures to be a comfy target for Brock Purdy, with plenty of downfield range remaining.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Kelce still ranked third among tight ends in targets last year and still has Patrick Mahomes. That's enough to keep him in starter range.

Kelce's yards per catch have declined for two straight years, down to 8.5 in his age-35 season. The underlying metrics also say he's likely near the end. Kelce posted the fewest yards per route, fewest yards after catch per reception and lowest Pro Football Focus grade of his career last season. The 3.9 YAC per reception marked a particularly noticeable drop (previous low of 5.0 the season before), especially when you consider his recent average target depths also falling vs. his earlier seasons.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Hockenson's fine as your PPR tight end. But he's not likely to become a difference maker vs. draft price as long as Justin Jefferson's healthy.

Hockenson endured an understandably limited 2024 after tearing two ligaments in his right knee in late December 2023. He didn't take the field until Week 9 and didn't reach 70% playing time in a game until Week 18. Hockenson played 79.4% of all offensive snaps in 2023 before going down. The knee — and the surrounding muscles — should be in much better shape this time. But Hockenson's target volume could remain limited with Justin Jefferson and Jordan Addison around. Jefferson missed time amid Hockenson's big 2023.

ATHLON'S TAKE
There's room for Kincaid to become a reliable weekly source of receptions. Just don't overtrust the likelihood that he delivers.

Kincaid actually climbed from 13th among tight ends in target share as a rookie to 10th last season. But he lost four games to a knee injury, and the Bills passed at the league's fourth-lowest rate in the first full season under offensive coordinator Joe Brady. Kincaid did increase his average target depth, despite the physical issues. And he trailed only Khalil Shakir in targets. The target competition remains modest for 2025. Shakir ranked just 38th among WRs in target share. Former Chargers WR Joshua Palmer was the biggest addition.

ATHLON'S TAKE
If Smith maintains the same role, he could continue to be valuable. But Tyreek Hill and Jaylen Waddle bounce backs could steal the targets.

Smith opened his first Dolphins season with the kind of limited work we'd seen across his previous two spots. He fell short of 50% playing time in each of the first six games. But he bumped up to 66% in Tua Tagovailoa's Week 8 return and stayed at 60% or higher in seven of the ensuing 10 games. Smith wound up with 41 more targets and 38 more receptions than his previous career highs. His TD rate also presents some regression potential.

ATHLON'S TAKE
There's downside risk to Andrews for this range. He's fine to target if he gets toward the bottom of TE1 territory. There's more risk earlier.

Last season marked the first time since his 2018 rookie campaign that Andrews ranked outside the top four tight ends in target share. He slid all the way to 18th. But Andrews also posted the highest receiving success rate of his career, according to Pro Football Reference. And he set a career high in TD catches. Will Andrews regain some of his lost target share, or will he blend more into a crowd that added WR DeAndre Hopkins and retains fellow TE Isaiah Likely?

ATHLON'S TAKE
You won't need to take Henry this high. But there's enough upside in his OB, his OC and his TD history to land him here at the end.

Henry led all Patriots in targets and receiving yards in Drake Maye's debut season. The meager TD production kept it from being an especially useful fantasy season. But that included at least some bad luck. According to Pro Football Focus, Henry's seven end-zone targets tied for 10th at the position. But only he and Trey McBride caught just one TD in that range, among the 13 tight ends with six-plus end-zone targets. Henry played for offensive cooordinator Josh McDaniels with the 2021 Patriots and caught a career-high nine TDs.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Ferguson went from being an upside play to likely just being an OK fantasy option. The ceiling would improve with a WR injury.

Ferguson's target outlook appeared much better before the Cowboys acquired George Pickens. The moody wideout is no lock to deliver — that's why Pittsburgh quit on him — but the Cowboys didn't give a Round 3 pick to have Pickens run decoy routes. He and CeeDee Lamb could make up one of the league's top WR duos. But we should also see a pass-leaning offense. Dallas passed at the sixth-highest rate last year, despite losing Dak Prescott for half the season.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Engram's short-range game makes him unattractive outside of full PPR leagues. He carries upside in that format, though.

The Broncos weren't worried about Engram losing eight games to a shoulder injury last season. Denver signed the 31-year-old (come Sept. 2) to a two-year, $23 million contract. That gives him the 10th-largest annual average among tight end contracts. Engram saw his yards per catch trail off with the Jaguars, thanks largely to short average target depths. He has averaged less than nine yards per catch in three of the past four seasons.

ATHLON'S TAKE
The WR group remains shallow, with DK Metcalf replacing George Pickens. There's talent here, but control your expectations.

Freiermuth's rate stats rebounded from a down 2023. But he has now gone four NFL seasons without averaging 4.0 receptions per game. He also has reached 40 receiving yards per game in just one of four seasons. His career-high catch rate in 2024 obviously boosted his efficiency but also leaves room for regression. Freiermuth earned a four-year extension at about $12 million per year. That would seem to indicate more use than ranking 14th among TEs in target share.

We've gotten much more disappointment from Pitts than production. He's still talented enough to get drafted, but don't chase him.

The Falcons seem to tell us every offseason about how they believe Pitts is about to step up. Meanwhile, he has averaged just 2.9 receptions and 36.9 yards per game over the three years since his impressive rookie campaign. Pitts trailed not only Drake London and Darnell Mooney, but even Ray-Ray McCloud III in receiving usage and production last season. Pitts' more wide receiver-styled game might make it tougher to attract targets, with two effective receivers on the perimeter.

There's room for concern around Warren taking as long as he did to break out in college. But he arrives as a high-upside player immediately.

Warren followed four quiet seasons at Penn State by breaking out to dominate the Nittany Lions offense last year. He accounted for 36% of the team's receptions, 34% of the receiving yards and 27% of the TD catches. Warren even took 26 carries for 218 yards and four TDs. That's more carries than Brock Bowers got across three seasons at Georgia. Warren joins a Colts offense with target opportunity, but Indy also must answer the quarterback question. Warren's best outcome would likely be Daniel Jones and his short-range game winning the job.

Ertz's upside is modest, but so is his ADP. He's a good target if you want to wait to be among the last in your league to address TE.

Ertz remained a short-range target with little after-catch ability in his first year with Washington. But Ertz also drew targets like the Ertz we've seen before. It helped to have rookie quarterback Jayden Daniels play well right away. It also helped to have offensive coordinator Kliff Kingsbury, who coached Ertz with the 2021-22 Cardinals. Re-signing Ertz (and tight end John Bates) told us the Commanders don't believe 2024 second-rounder Ben Sinnott will be ready to start.

Kraft was one of four Packers in the range of 70-76 targets last year. Expect more passing with a healthier Jordan Love, but also inconsistent targets.

In 2023, Kraft took advantage of TE classmate Luke Musgrave going down. Last season, Kraft simply passed him on the depth chart. That came despite Kraft missing most of the summer recovery from a spring pectoral tear. He showed no ill signs in playing every game and posting the third-highest yards per catch among tight ends with 10-plus receptions. Kraft's downfield speed — before and after the catch — set him apart at the position. His ceiling's limited, though, by Green Bay's preference to spread targets.

Okonkwo had just one game with more than three catches before the final four weeks last season. Don't get too excited.

Cam Ward should be an upgrade at quarterback, and the target competition remains iffy. The Titans imported wide receiver Tyler Lockett after he dropped off significantly in Seattle last year. And they waited until Round 4 to add a pair of wideouts. That helps Okonkwo's target outlook. But he has played just 66% and 61% of snaps the past two seasons. Round 4 pick Gunnar Helm led Texas in receptions last season.

Goedert has topped four TD catches once in seven pro seasons and in none of the past three years. There's not much to chase.

Goedert has lost games to injuries each of the past six seasons. Pro Football Reference pegged Goedert for a career-low success rate — despite a career-high 80.8% catch rate. Philly kept him amid spring trade rumors. But the Eagles also imported reserve tight ends Harrison Bryant and Kylen Granson. Neither will challenge to overtake Goedert. But perhaps they'll cut into his targets in an offense already tenuous on overall passing volume.

Johnson's OK as a third tight end on a best-ball roster. But he's not likely to be someone you want to start in a typical redraft lineup.

Despite never having averaged 3.0 receptions per game for a season, Johnson's working on a contract that pays him more than $10 million a year. Last season marked the first in which Johnson played all 17 games. Season-ending injuries to wide receivers Chris Olave and Rashid Shaheed helped Johnson rank second in targets. But they're back, and New Orleans added Brandin Cooks. Derek Carr's abrupt retirement adds a challenge.

Schultz dropped from consecutive top-12 finishes in fantasy points per game to 34th last year. He's barely worth draft consideration.

Schultz flashed for a pair of double-digit fantasy scores late last season. Those marked the only two games in which he found the end zone, and two of only three in which he exceeded four catches. Overall, Schultz's receptions per game fell to just 3.1, his lowest mark since the first two years of his career. Houston then acquired Christian Kirk and drafted receivers in Round 2 and Round 4. A bounce-back performance from C.J. Stroud would boost all the pass-catchers.

23 MIKE GESICKI
6-6/245/AGE: 29

EFP: 105.7
BYE WEEK: 10
ATHLON'S TAKE
The contract says we should expect Gesicki to stay more involved. The team passes at the league's highest rate. Upside combo late.

Through most of Gesicki's first season with the Bengals, he alternated between barely seeing the ball when Tee Higgins was healthy to posting big numbers when Higgins was out. That changed at the end of the season, when Gesicki racked up 18 catches over just the final two games — with Higgins and Ja'Marr Chase healthy. Cincinnati re-signed him for $25.5 million over three years after the season.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Head coach Sean McVay sounds like he wants to get Ferguson involved. Higbee's best on waivers while we see what develops.

Higbee didn't return from his January 2024 double-ligament knee injury until Week 15 of last season. He led a weak tight end corps from there, including 12 catches for 112 yards across the two playoff games. The Rams did spend a second-round pick on Terrance Ferguson, who possesses elite athleticism for the position. Swapping out Cooper Kupp for Davante Adams could create room over the middle of the field.

EFP: 95.3
BYE WEEK: 14
ATHLON'S TAKE
We're betting on Sanders mixing in with a crowd at receiver and tight end rather than standing out. He's a third tight end for now.

Sanders' rookie campaign found him leading Carolina tight ends in targets, receptions and yards. But he ranked just seventh on the team in targets, trailing an undrafted rookie wide receiver (Jalen Coker) who played five fewer games and Diontae Johnson, who played just seven before getting the boot. Sanders' final college season found him working downfield (9.8-yard average target depth, according to Pro Football Focus) and producing after the catch (7.7 yards per reception). There's room if that guy shows up.

EFP: 94.1
ATHLON'S TAKE
Likely makes for a solid handcuff to Andrews, in formats where that makes sense. We're still not sure he's a standalone play with Andrews healthy.

Last year saw growth in Likely's offensive role, even though Mark Andrews played in all 17 games. Likely's playing time climbed from 44% in a 2023 season that found Andrews missing seven games to 60%. Likely trailed Andrews by just 11 targets and 13 receptions for the season but also watched Andrews deliver more yards per reception and a better receiving TD rate. Likely's growth as a player should continue, but there are only so many targets. The Ravens added wide receiver DeAndre Hopkins to a low-volume pass offense.

27 CADE OTTON

6-5/247/AGE: 26

EFP: 91.6
BYE WEEK: 9
ATHLON'S TAKE
Otton's not a TE to target in fantasy. He's someone you eventually roll with because you need to. Leave him on waivers.

Otton has played a lot of snaps over the past two years. He stayed on the field for 96.5% of them in 2023 and then 92.4% last year. That helped him rank second among Bucs in targets last season despite missing three games. The Bucs chose wide receiver Emeka Egbuka in Round 1, but he could just be a better version of Jalen McMillan. Otton's best three-game stretch of production came mid-season, in games missed by Mike Evans and Chris Godwin.

28 THEO JOHNSON

6-6/260/AGE: 24

EFP: 88.9
BYE WEEK: 14
ATHLON'S TAKE
Johnson's top-shelf athleticism makes him intriguing over the long term. It's tough to envision significant fantasy impact in 2025, though.

Johnson was having an encouraging rookie season that included playing more than 80% of the snaps right away. His targets picked up in Week 5 and then again over his final five games. Unfortunately, that span ended with a Lisfranc foot sprain that cost him the final five games. He had surgery in December and is expected to be ready, but that's an injury that can linger into the following season. We'll have to watch Johnson's status through the summer. He'll find an upgrade over last year's quarterback situation.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Loveland's an exciting long-term play. But he'll need to depose veterans for a role while hoping Caleb Williams rebounds from last year. He's risky.

After the Bears drafted Loveland 10th overall, there were reports that multiple NFL teams also tried to move up to get him. Loveland brings wide receiver-type movement in a tight end body. Loveland dominated receiving market shares in a still-limited pass offense at Michigan. Chicago should be friendlier to the pass overall, but the Bears also sport lots of target competition. They already returned WRs DJ Moore and Rome Odunze and TE Cole Kmet. They also added wideout Luther Burden III in the second round.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Perhaps Dissly emerges in-season as a spot starter once again. Leave him on waivers to see whether that occurs.

Dissly's 50 catches ranked third on the Chargers, while his 9.6 yards per catch reminded you of his limitations. The Chargers drafted wide receiver Tre Harris in Round 2, took tight end Oronde Gadsden II in Round 5 and signed Tyler Conklin in free agency. That's enough to challenge Dissly's career-high target share. We'll see whether the Chargers lean back toward the run after importing Najee Harris and first-rounder Omarion Hampton.

ATHLON'S TAKE
There's upside to Mayer if he can lead the position for some team. He's still under contract through 2026, though. We might have to wait.

We headed into last season with the Raiders telling us the offense had room for both Mayer and Brock Bowers. But we didn't get much chance to see it. Mayer got in three games before leaving the team and dealing with a personal matter. He returned for solid-to-good playing time from Week 11 on. But Mayer reached four targets in just two games, with Bowers well established as the receiving lead. Mayer arrived as an early second-round pick in 2023 after a strong, well-rounded three years at Notre Dame.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Gray looks like Kansas City's Isaiah Likely. There's upside to the player and situation, but also a vet in the player's way.

Gray got a three-year, $18 million extension last September. He had just 65 catches over three years behind him at that point. But Gray ranked fourth among last year's Chiefs in receptions, beat Travis Kelce by 2.4 yards per catch and ranked second on the team in touchdown receptions (behind Xavier Worthy). Gray's playing time has floated in the 52-58% range over the past three years. We'll see if that climbs this season.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Strange should be the best bet among Jaguars TEs this year, but he'll need to prove there's fantasy relevance to his game.

Strange made everyone take notice with an 11-catch game against the Jets last December. But he totaled just nine more targets and six catches over the three games following that one. Strange had just three other games of more than three receptions. He did arrive as a second-round pick from Penn State in 2023, where he outproduced Theo Johnson and Tyler Warren in his final season. In addition to Jacksonville's young wideouts, the Jags added TEs Johnny Mundt and Hunter Long for competition.

BYE WEEK: 9
ATHLON'S TAKE
Taylor's not likely to become a high-end producer. But he's got the skill set to become an all-around TE who rarely leaves the field.

The Jets made Taylor the third tight end selected in this year's draft. Taylor averaged an unexciting 10.1 yards per catch for his college career, though he ranked third in receptions in his first year, on a talented LSU team — ahead of Brian Thomas Jr., Kyren Lacy and Jack Bech, among others. Taylor finished third each of the next two years as well and then notched a 66th-percentile speed score at the NFL Scouting Combine. His blocking skills will help Taylor get on the field early — and stay on the field.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Fannin's likely stuck as the fourth or fifth option this season on a team with unexciting QBs. He's fun as a long-term dynasty play, though.

Fannin just finished setting FBS records for receptions and receiving yards by a tight end before landing with the Browns in Round 3. After making the pick, general manager Andrew Berry told 92.3 The Fan in Cleveland, "He's a very versatile player that you can line up across the field." The Browns still have David Njoku under contract through 2025, so it'll take some creativity to find Fannin a meaningful role. At the same, Cleveland has room for a slot receiver to emerge. Perhaps Fannin can get on the field with Njoku at times.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Seattle and Fant have spent three years working together to sap his fantasy worth. Throw in a new QB, new OC and rookie TE, and we'll pass.

The Seahawks won't let Fant escape. But they also won't stop drafting challengers. In 2024, it was fourth-rounder AJ Barner. This year brought Elijah Arroyo late in the second. Seattle decision-makers immediately praised Arroyo's ability. He sounds like a player they want to get on the field quickly. Fant's mere 3.4 catches and 35.7 yards per game last season marked highs for his time in Seattle. He'll turn just 28 this November, in his seventh season.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Sinnott gave us no reason to believe in 2024. But he's a young, athletic guy who has played multiple positions. Patience could pay off.

It's easy to forget that the Commanders took Sinnott as the second tight end off last year's board, in Round 2. The Commanders might have forgotten. They re-signed both Zach Ertz and John Bates after last season, pretty clear indicators they at least didn't know if they could trust Sinnott in 2025. But Sinnott's a decent-sized player with superior athleticism who averaged a nice 13.9 yards per catch in college. If he shows development in camp and preseason, there should be room to climb the depth chart.

ATHLON'S TAKE
Arroyo's long term is intriguing. It's tough to count on a guy with one year of college production jumping in for big rookie-year numbers.

The Seahawks acted like they stole Arroyo later in Round 2. "If he didn't miss time [in college], his talent is like a top-15 pick," general manager John Schneider told reporters. He and head coach Mike Macdonald believe Arroyo's capable of running any route and even lining up as an "X" receiver. The missed time was due to a torn ACL during his sophomore year at Miami (Fla.), but he rebounded to average a whopping 16.9 yards per catch his final season. Arroyo has the speed and size to win both before and after the catch, making him a constant big-play threat.

It's too early to totally give up on the 25-year-old (come September), but Musgrave needs help to find fantasy relevance.

Musgrave got shoved aside after injury allowed Tucker Kraft to start in his place in 2023. Green Bay simply made that the norm last season, even though Kraft spent most of summer recovering from a pectoral injury. Musgrave retains downfield ability and high-end speed for the position. But he played just 30.7% of the offensive snaps over the seven games he appeared in last year. Of course, it's not helping Musgrave that he has played in just 18 of a possible 34 games across his first two seasons.

Ferguson will need to push ahead of Tyler Higbee and WR Tutu Atwell to approach relevance. We'll see if he can get there during the season.

After the Rams drafted Ferguson in Round 2, head coach Sean McVay said he had "big plans" for the youngster. "He's a versatile player," McVay said, per Rams Wire. "It enables us to be a little bit more multiple in some of the personnel we can present to defenses." There's potential for more "12" personnel groupings, which would put two TEs on the field at once (with Tyler Higbee). Ferguson did close out his Oregon run with a nice 13.7 yards per catch as a senior. But he didn't otherwise post big numbers.

AIDAN HUTCHINSON

DETROIT LIONS The Lions' defense was decimated by a rash of injuries in 2024, though none hurt more than defensive end Aidan Hutchinson going down after racking up 7.5 sacks in just five games. A return to health will go a long way for this unit, which allowed the third-most passing yards per game a season ago. The departure of defensive coordinator Aaron Glenn hurts, but Detroit upgraded its secondary by signing cornerback D.J. Reed, and drafting defensive tackle Tyleik Williams reinforces the front seven. Expect more sacks and an improved pass defense.

LOS ANGELES RAMS In their first year in a decade without Aaron Donald, the Rams took a step forward on defense. Drafting Defensive Rookie of the Year Jared Verse and his college teammate Braden Fiske certainly had something to do with that improvement. Los Angeles' young defense should keep ascending with coordinator Chris Shula staying put. The Rams addressed their suspect run defense by signing Poona Ford and drafting Ty Hamilton, both defensive tackles. Rookie linebackers Josaiah Stewart and Chris Paul Jr. also add depth to an ascending pass rush.

INDIANAPOLIS COLTS Only three teams allowed more yards per game last year than the Colts, who remade the back end of their defense in the offseason. Indianapolis parted ways with defensive coordinator Gus Bradley and brought in former Bengals coordinator Lou Anarumo, and the Colts made a marquee free-agent signing in cornerback Charvarius Ward. They didn't stop there, signing safety Cam Bynum and spending their third-round pick on cornerback Justin Walley. To add to an aging defensive line, Indy drafted defensive end JT Tuimoloau. New leadership and personnel should turn the tide.

KANSAS CITY CHIEFS The Chiefs still have the best defensive coordinator in the league in Steve Spagnuolo. However, their personnel isn't what it once was. Kansas City's sack numbers fell off as Chris Jones recorded his fewest sacks since his rookie year in 2016. And after giving up 40 points in the Super Bowl, the Chiefs didn't throw a ton of resources at the defense in the offseason. Bringing back linebacker Nick Bolton and drafting front seven depth is good business, but KC's DST might not be the commodity it has been in recent years.

SAN FRANCISCO 49ERS Beyond Nick Bosa and Fred Warner, the 49ers saw a mass exodus on defense. Edge rusher Leonard Floyd, linebacker Drew Greenlaw, defensive tackle Javon Hargrave, cornerback Charvarius Ward and safety Talanoa Hufanga moved on from a team that finished bottom five in points allowed. Accordingly, San Francisco fired coordinator Nick Sorensen and reunited with Robert Saleh. The former Jets head coach should be able to get the most out of a unit that added to its front in the draft, but the roster reshuffling on that side of the ball does not inspire confidence.

MIAMI DOLPHINS The Dolphins finished top 10 in points allowed and top five in yards allowed in coordinator Anthony Weaver's first season in charge and still finished as a bottom-tier D/ST. Losing safety Jevon Holland, cornerback Kendall Fuller and, in all likelihood, cornerback Jalen Ramsey does not help Miami's defensive outlook. The Dolphins are also counting on pass-rushers Bradley Chubb and Jaelan Phillips to return to peak form after ACL injuries. Miami's draft, specifically its selection of defensive tackle Kenneth Grant, aimed to address the defensive line, but the secondary is a glaring concern.

MICAH PARSONS

01 MICAH PARSONS
COWBOYS

BYE WEEK: 10
HT: 6-3
WT: 250
AGE: 26

Parsons suffered a high-ankle sprain in Week 4 last season, which cost him the next four contests and limited his snaps in his return. He still racked up 6.5 more sacks than any other Cowboy for the season. Parsons also tied for 23rd league-wide in tackles for a loss and 11th in QB hits. A healthy Parsons could easily set new career highs in all three categories in just his age-26 season. He's likely still an ascending player, especially when you consider Parsons didn't play edge full time until 2023, his third NFL season.

HT: 6-7
WT: 268

A Week 6 leg fracture truncated what might have been a special 2024. Hutchinson had already racked up 7.5 sacks and 17 QB hits before going down in the middle of his fifth game. Only 33 players had more hits for the entire season. Hutchinson should have time to get back to full strength ahead of Week 1. And he has played around 90% of Detroit's defensive snaps when healthy over the past two seasons. That gives him more opportunities to make plays and collect stats at a position where most play less than 80%.

03 WILL ANDERSON JR.
TEXANS

BYE WEEK: 6
HT: 6-4
WT: 243
AGE: 24

Anderson's second NFL season looks better when you factor in the midseason ankle sprain. That cost him nearly all of Week 9, kept him out the next two games and lowered Anderson's playing time even after he returned. The third overall pick in 2023 ramped back up in the playoffs, delivering 3.5 sacks among five QB hits in Houston's two games. Anderson will turn just 24 in early September and has yet to hit his pass-rush ceiling. He led the nation in sacks (17.5) and tackles for a loss (33.5) as a 20-year-old Alabama sophomore in 2021.

Crosby was bound to miss time at some point, after appearing in every game across his first five NFL seasons. Even last season found him playing through his Week 2 ankle sprain until a December aggravation required arthroscopic surgery. That issue shouldn't linger into 2025, though. The Raiders confirmed that by extending Crosby through 2029 this offseason, at an average annual salary of $35.5 million. No player has more tackles for a loss since Crosby entered the league in 2019. Just four have more QB hits.

HT: 6-4
WT: 272

Garrett seemed ready to force a trade at the start of the offseason. He changed his tune after a meeting with the staff … and a lucrative extension. Garrett's $40 million annual average on his new deal shows that Cleveland doesn't expect any decline in a season that will find Garrett turning 30 in late December. His recent play certainly hasn't shown any drop-off. Garrett has delivered 14-plus sacks and 26 or more QB hits in four straight seasons. No one has more sacks over that span. Only Nick Bosa has more QB hits.

49ERS

BYE WEEK: 14
HT: 6-4
WT: 266
AGE: 27

Bosa's sack numbers indicate more volatility to his play than we've actually seen when he's been healthy. He has exceeded 10.5 in just two of his six seasons. But only three players have more total sacks since Bosa entered the league in 2019. And last year marked the second time he lost multiple games to injury. Since 2021, Bosa has 22 more QB hits than anyone else in the NFL. The biggest challenge for Bosa in 2025 will be keeping up his high productivity amid a 49ers D-line that has more questions than proven performers.

Hendrickson and Cincinnati have struggled with contract-extension talks over the past several seasons. But consistent trade murmurs haven't kept him from delivering 35 sacks over the past two years — 4.5 more than anyone else in the league. The Bengals extended DT B.J. Hill and imported 340-pound former Packers DT T.J. Slaton Jr., so the middle of the line should be strong and absorb blocking attention. Hendrickson turned 30 in early December, but he also set career highs in total snaps and defensive snap share.

RAMS

HT: 6-4
WT: 260
AGE: 24

Verse probably fared better as a 2024 rookie than you realized. His 4.5 sacks tied for just 95th in the league. He likely ranked outside the top 30 D-linemen in fantasy points per game in your league. But he played the eighth-most regular-season snaps among all edge players. That helped him rank fifth among linemen in solo tackles and fourth in assisted tackles. And Pro Football Focus credited Verse with the fourth-most pressures among edge players. That portends sack upside, though he might not be athletic enough to challenge for the league lead.

Greenard delivered the third-most pressures among all edge players in his first Vikings season, according to Pro Football Focus. That produced the second-best PFF pass-rushing grade among his five seasons. Greenard has now set career highs in fantasy production each of the past two years, and he's still heading into just his age-28 season. The Vikings used free agency to import Jonathan Allen and Javon Hargrave, a pair of experienced and proven interior rushers. That could make 2025 even more fruitful for Greenard.

Don't let Brown's lost 2024 overshadow a 2023 that found him setting the NFL record for tackles by a defensive tackle. Brown also quietly improved his pass rush, tallying 15 QB hits that season after averaging 11 across his first three years. He joined voluntary workouts in spring and should have his repaired knee back to full strength well ahead of Week 1. Carolina also worked to improve the D-line around Brown via both free agency and the draft. The enhancements could free the DT up to make more plays.

Buckner went from playing every game for three straight seasons to missing five whole contests and most of another in 2024. Should we worry? We'll see. Buckner suffered a high-ankle sprain in Week 2. But he made it back to play 75% of the snaps or more in each of the final nine games. He earned the best Pro Football Focus run-defense grade of his career and led the Colts in pressures per game and pass-rushing grade.

The Bills used free agency and the draft to boost their edge group, starting that run with an early-March extension for Rousseau, ahead of his fifth season. The sack high coincided with edge Brian Burns' arrival. Abdul Carter's arrival should open even more room.

Hunter continued to deliver in his first year after leaving Minnesota in free agency. That included a career-high 23 QB hits. It's worth noting, however, that Hunter's snap shared nudged down a bit. He played 70% of Houston's defensive snaps, down from a career-high 88.9% in 2023 and his lowest share since 2016 — Hunter's second season. A one-year, big-money extension this offseason showed he remains a key member of the defense at age 30. But we probably shouldn't expect the same ceiling he sported with the Vikings.

What are we gonna get here: the monster sack collector of 2023, or the guy who surrounded that with three seasons of eight or fewer? The latter's more likely. The few guys with perennial potential to average a sack a game sit higher on this list. But Hines-Allen sports high weekly and season-long upside. He's one of just seven edge players to have topped 60 pressures each of the past three years. The others: Trey Hendrickson, Myles Garrett, Micah Parsons, Nick Bosa, Danielle Hunter and Za'Darius Smith.

Sweat posted a disappointing 2024 after getting big money from the Bears. Nagging injuries — toe, shin, ankle — didn't help. The team's encouraged by Sweat's turnaround chances, though. GM Ryan Poles told ESPN 1000 back in May: "I don't think there is anyone in this building working as hard as Montez Sweat right now. ... He's locked in like I've never seen him before." Sweat's got the physical ability and has been durable overall. A more competitive Bears team could foster more favorable defensive conditions.

Walker looks like a rising defensive star after hitting 10-plus sacks each of the past two years. But he actually has some improving to do. Despite supplying the league's 12th-most sacks over the past two years, Walker ranked just 35th in QB hits over the same span. Walker's best Pro Football Focus grade to date ranked just 52nd among 151 edges who played 100-plus snaps. He benefits from playing opposite more consistent pass-rusher Josh Hines-Allen. Carter hit this year's draft as one of the few consensus "elite" prospects. He delivered an FBS-leading 23.5 tackles for a loss last season, which marked just his first as a full-time edge player. Carter started his Penn State run as an off-ball LB who proved wildly efficient rushing the passer even on limited opportunities. He'll turn just 22 in October and sports a high ceiling for the short and long term. The biggest 2025 question will be playing time. The Giants retain 2024 edge starters Brian Burns and Kayvon Thibodeaux.

Turner followed up a strong rookie campaign by increasing his playing time – 61.5% snap share to 74.8% – and continuing the production. Only two interior defensive linemen tallied more sacks over the past two seasons than Turner's 17. Just eight defensive linemen in all have collected more tackles. Turner figures to benefit from playing amid a talented young D-line that added strength inside and out last year. His age-26 campaign might hold a higher ceiling than Zach Sieler sports.

15 JAMIEN SHERWOOD
JETS

BYE WEEK: 9 | HT: 6-2 | WT: 216 | AGE: 25

Sherwood went from three-year reserve to top-five fantasy scorer in 2024. The Jets followed that by giving him $15 million a year ahead of free agency. So why doesn't he sit higher in these ranks? We're still learning about him. Sherwood ranked a solid 18th among 92 qualifying LBs in overall Pro Football Focus grade. But he posted lower marks in tackling, pass rushing and coverage grades. The contract means he'll retain a three-down role. But we'll see if Sherwood can replicate the numbers.

16 PATRICK QUEEN
STEELERS

BYE WEEK: 5 | HT: 6-0 | WT: 230 | AGE: 26

Queen's scoring dipped in his first year with the Steelers, and it didn't look like a fluke. He logged poor grades in four of Pro Football Focus' categories, rating well only as a pass-rusher. Queen saw fewer opportunities there than he did the previous two years in Baltimore. But expect him to rebound in sacks in 2024. He'll need to improve his play to bring the solo tackles back up and add other big plays. But Queen's nearly $14 million-a-year contract should guarantee he keeps a three-down role.

David and Bobby Wagner might be robots from the same manufacturer. David turned 35 in January but spent 2024 as Tampa Bay's only decent linebacker. David drew the second-most pass-rushing reps of his career — fifth-most among non-edge LBs — and tied his career high with 29 pressures (third among LBs), according to Pro Football Focus. David also proved his worth in coverage with his most passes defensed since 2020. The Bucs likely didn't solve the LB spot next to him, with journeyman Anthony Walker Jr. the biggest addition.

BYE WEEK: 14 | HT: 6-2 | WT: 236 | AGE: 30

Last year's combo of hamstring injury, neck injury and concussion marked the third time in the past four years that Jewell lost four-plus games to injury. Why bother drafting that guy at all? Because Jewell posted the position's 11th-best scoring average when he did play, and he topped that scoring average in 2022. Jewell's a strong bet for tackles, especially with a lackluster Panthers defense around him. And he delivers big plays in all phases. Finding insurance — or a replacement — isn't difficult at LB.

Cashman has now set career highs in fantasy points per game for two straight years. His move to Minnesota brought a huge increase in his pass rushing. Cashman's 168 pass-rushing reps nearly tripled his total for 2023, according to Pro Football Focus. He ranked second among off-ball LBs for the season and fourth in pressures. He also ran as the lone full-time Vikings LB. Ivan Pace Jr. hovered just above 50% playing time with Cashman healthy.

Luvu has topped 91% playing time in three straight seasons and has two years left on a contract paying him a little more than $10 million per year. Luvu's not as good a bet for regular production in tackle-heavy leagues.

Van Ginkel's sixth season produced a fantasy-scoring average two-plus points ahead of any other year. Van Ginkel's not likely to keep scoring TDs, after tallying three over the past two years. But he moves well both coming forward as a pass-rusher and run defender, and dropping into coverage. Most passes-defensed leaders up front rely on deflections at the line. But Van Ginkel dropped into coverage 56 more times than any other edge last year. He's a boom-bust candidate, but boom's OK to chase at times.

The three teams that Barton has started for so far in the NFL each let him walk in free agency after his season with them. This time, at least, the Broncos let him leave for a suitor offering $9 million guaranteed on a three-year deal. That almost certainly locks Barton in as a three-down player for a Titans defense that booted LB Kenneth Murray Jr. And Barton does put up numbers when he's on the field. He'll face little challenge in a weak corps.

BYE WEEK: 10 | HT: 5-11 | WT: 237 | AGE: 25

Bolton teased us with a 2022 season that made him look like he'd at least be a monster in tackle-friendly IDP leagues. It was easy to blame his 2023 production dip on the wrist injury, especially after Bolton returned to full-time snaps and big tackle numbers in the playoffs. But last season found LB Drue Tranquill increasing his playing time and presenting a bigger tackle challenger than Bolton had previously faced. The Chiefs re-signed both this offseason at rates that say they'll reprise their 2024 roles.

BYE WEEK: 8 | HT: 6-2 | WT: 230 | AGE: 30

Oluokun doesn't get an injury pass for his disappointing 2024. His scoring average lagged even when he was healthy. And that's largely due to his playing time decreasing. Oluokun played every defensive snap in 33 of 34 games over his first two Jaguars seasons. Last year found him hitting 100% just four times. Oluokun's role — and production — did climb late in the year. If the new coaching staff indicates a return to full playing time, then Oluokun could again deliver LB1-level scoring. We'll see what camp reveals.

Campbell should be a player on the rise, right? Detroit raised the Year 2 playing time for a guy it drafted 18th overall the year before. But did it? Campbell played just 56% and 73% of snaps the first two weeks, trailing LB Derrick Barnes in each. He jumped to 100% when Barnes went down (for the season) in Week 3, yet dipped back below 80% for three more games. Campbell became a full-timer the rest of the way, but then the Lions extended Barnes at $8.5 million per year. He and Alex Anzalone challenge Campbell's snaps.

Pratt's been rumored as a cut candidate since the end of the season, and perhaps the Bengals drafted LB Demetrius Knight Jr. in Round 2 to replace him. But Knight didn't break out until his age-22 season in college, which makes him look like a weak bet to immediately start in the NFL. Even if the Bengals do decide to move on, the 29-year-old would be coming off two productive seasons and likely land another starting shot.

The Browns entered Round 2 of the draft still needing a QB … and then drafted Schwesinger 33rd overall. He spent just one year starting at UCLA but earned All-American honors with his play in all phases. Schwesinger's draft capital says Cleveland expects him to be ready early. His cross-category scoring in 2024 says he could quickly become an IDP force. And the uncertainty around Jeremiah Owusu-Koramoah's neck injury — plus Jordan Hicks' age (33) — boost the opportunity potential.

BRIAN BRANCH

LIONS

HT: 6-0

The Lions fixed the fluctuating playing time of Branch's rookie season, making him a full-time player in 2024. That's because Branch went from near-totally playing slot cornerback in 2023 to becoming a safety/slot CB last season. Branch split his 2024 snaps near-evenly among playing "in the box," covering the slot and lining up as the deep safety, according to Pro Football Focus. That makes him a threat to score across categories and keeps him involved against the run and pass. Branch has played well in all areas.

Baker enjoyed a big rebound last year after losing five games to injury in a rough 2023. He set career highs in total tackles, assists and tackles for a loss. Baker's tackle numbers benefit from him spending around 55% of his snaps lining up either "in the box" or in the slot. Both roles put a DB closer to the ball more often than when he plays in deep coverage. Arizona rewarded Baker's rebound with a three-year, $54 million extension in December that should lock him into the same role through at least 2026.

After leading all DBs in fantasy points in 2023, Winfield was on pace for another top-5 finish last season. But a Week 1 foot injury cost him four games. Then a right knee injury knocked him out of Week 14 and cost the final four games. That marked the third time in four seasons that Winfield has missed at least four games. But the cross-category production has been strong when he's healthy. Winfield has typically supplied more tackles vs. the pass but could see a run-tackle boost behind iffy linebackers.

Hamilton delivered a second straight top-10 fantasy season in 2024. His scoring average came down. But Hamilton raised his weekly floor with a boost in run tackles. His role didn't change, so the safety likely got more opportunities via the downgrade from Patrick Queen to Trenton Simpson at the second LB spot. Baltimore added only a low-level free agent, a Day 3 rookie and three undrafted free agents at linebacker. First-round rookie S Malaki Starks looks like more of a deep-safety type, allowing Hamilton to roam.

Cross entered 2024 with just four NFL starts behind him. But he became an every-week fantasy starter thanks to monster tackle numbers. James' fantasy scoring average last season dipped to its lowest level since 2019, his abbreviated (five games) second pro campaign. James' tackles fell off in 2024. But he tallied a career high in sacks (5.5) on the most pass-rushing attempts of his career under a new coaching staff. James also played the second-most coverage snaps of his career. That combo can likely help explain some of the tackle dip. The Chargers did also play fewer defensive snaps than in 2023. James should remain near peak for his age-29 season.

Delpit's worst scoring average among his three starting seasons still landed him among the top 30 DBs in fantasy last year. His tackle numbers remained good, but Delpit suddenly lacked any plays on the ball in coverage. One issue might have been his smallest percentage of playing time spent at deep safety. Delpit has always moved around the formation, but last season found him leaning more toward playing in the "box" or covering the slot. The Browns didn't add much to the secondary, so we'll see about Delpit's role specifics.

Chinn's no lock to stay in an NFL team's lineup. The Panthers and Commanders have let him walk the past two offseasons. But he played every snap in 12 of 20 games with Washington last season. And then Chinn got more than $16.26 million on a two-year deal from the Raiders. Chinn has consistently proved limited in coverage, but that's not bad for his fantasy value as long as his team keeps putting him on the field. Chinn might wind up being the best linebacker in a weak Raiders defense this year (while playing safety).

Elliott became a surprise top-10 scorer in fantasy points per game in his first season with the Steelers. He delivered a career high, powered by production across stat categories. Elliott's mere one INT each of the past two years despite 13 total passes defensed signals big-play upside remaining. Elliott figures to spend plenty more time near the line or in the slot, with Minkah Fitzpatrick still the free safety.

Dugger has increased his time in deep coverage over the past two years. It hasn't hurt his tackle totals, though. In fact, he set career highs in tackles for a loss each of the past two years, which indicates he's getting plenty of opportunities near the line of scrimmage. If Dugger, who battled an ankle injury can get fully healthy — and stay there — he'll have upside beyond this level.

Lake has progressed from special-teamer to half-time defender to full-timer over his three NFL seasons. That first full starting season found him scoring as a top-30 fantasy CB despite nary an INT. Lake spread his time around but ran as the team's primary slot cover man. That role helped boost his tackle numbers. We'll see whether he holds further upside in making plays on the ball. Lake did grab six INTs among 15 passes defensed across his three starting seasons at UCLA, so we should at least get a boost from zero INTs.

This might be too low for Bates, who has finished each of his two Atlanta seasons among the top 5 DBs in total fantasy points and the top 10 in points per game. But those two finishes might have him overpriced. Bates benefited from returning INTs for TDs each of the past two years, and he has snagged at least four INTs each of the past three years. His previous four seasons included just one TD return and no season with more than three INTs. Bates' seven forced fumbles over the past two years leave further room for regression.

Witherspoon dipped to barely inside the top 30 in total fantasy points and outside the top 50 in points per game in his second season. That followed a top-15 scoring average in his rookie year. His role didn't really change, despite the new coaching staff. Witherspoon actually spent even more of his time in fantasy-friendly spots as slot corner and even "box" safety. McKinney's eight INTs nearly doubled his career total in his first Packers season. That number's likely coming down in 2025, simply because even the top interceptors rarely repeat high-end totals in that volatile category. McKinney still trailed his final scoring average with the Giants, thanks primarily to a significant tackle decline. Blame a role shift that pushed more of McKinney's snaps from "in the box" to deep coverage, and expect more of the same in 2025.

BUFFALO BILLS

INSIDE THE LOCKER ROOM

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

Which receiver will get the most targets, Keon Coleman, Joshua Palmer or Khalil Shakir? By adding Palmer to the offense, the Bills should be able to find a little more success in the intermediate passing game, and he figures to inherit the bulk of targets that went to Amari Cooper and Mack Hollins. But Shakir will continue to be the favorite receiving weapon for Josh Allen because of their shared history together. Shakir was targeted 100 times in 2024, and he caught 76 because he is so readily available due to his ability to get open and then run after the catch.

Should we expect a bounce-back season from Dalton Kincaid? Yes, if he can stay healthy, which he did not in 2024. Even so, he played only 13 games and had the second-most targets on the team with 76, while backup Dawson Knox played 16 games and had just 33 targets. There is a big expectation being placed on Kincaid in 2025 to become a true difference-maker.

Which RB is a better handcuff for James Cook — Ray Davis or Ty Johnson? Davis showed promise as a rookie in 2024, but the Bills re-signed Johnson in free agency because he was so dependable as a runner, receiver and, perhaps most importantly, pass protector. That said, Davis will have a chance to cut into Johnson's snap count, but the thing to watch is whether the Bills give Cook more than a 45% snap share in the last year of his contract, which would cut into both Davis' and Johnson's touches.

MIAMI DOLPHINS

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

How much will Jaylen Wright cut into De'Von Achane's touches? It would behoove the Dolphins to relieve the smaller Achane of some of his workload in 2025, and the most obvious area would be short-yardage carries. Miami needs to improve its physical, up-the-middle rushing, and Wright, Alexander Mattison and rookie sixth-round pick Ollie Gordon II all seem to be better options to run downhill and take away goal-line chances from Achane. He should still, nonetheless, maintain his heavy activity as a pass-catcher, while the Dolphins try to be more efficient in giving him home-run opportunities with his carries in the outside zone.

At 31, does Tyreek Hill have another 100-catch season in him? Considering last season was atrocious compared to his standards and was still an 81-reception season, it's certainly not out of the question for Hill to return to triple digits. Opposing defenses will try to keep him from beating them over the top, and with Tua Tagovailoa accurate in the short to intermediate portions of the field, Hill can surely find ample opportunities for shorter catches.

Will Jonnu Smith have more receptions than any of the Dolphin receivers? This was the case last year, but it would figure to more likely be an exception than the new norm. The Dolphins would like to have Hill and Jaylen Waddle be the focal point of the passing game, with Smith and Achane complementing them. But defenses could once again be content to let Smith beat them.

NEW ENGLAND PATRIOTS

INSIDE THE LOCKER ROOM

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

How much will TreVeyon Henderson cut into Rhamondre Stevenson's touches? My guess is significantly. The Patriots have always regarded running backs as fungible (Bill Belichick never had a back rush for 1,000-plus yards in back-to-back seasons), and that's probably not going to change under Mike Vrabel. Stevenson will open the year as the starter and get the bulk of the carries, but Henderson will ultimately play a sizable role in the New England offense in 2025 and beyond.

Can we expect Drake Maye to pass for 3,000 yards? Yes. If you extrapolated his numbers from last year's season (when he passed for 2,276 yards in 12 starts), he would have been at 2,976 had he played 17 games. Honestly, if he doesn't, it'll be on him. The Patriots made significant upgrades when it comes to his protection plan, as well as the skill-position players around him. As a result, it's reasonable to expect him to hit the 3,000-yard mark in 2025.

What are the expectations for Stefon Diggs? He projects to be the No. 1 receiver in the New England offense. If he's healthy — and that's a considerable if, given the nature of the knee injury he suffered last October — it's reasonable to expect 70-plus catches and 1,000 yards out of Diggs. That would make him the first Patriots receiver to break 1,000 receiving yards in a season since Julian Edelman in 2019.

NEW YORK JETS

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

How much will Braelon Allen cut into Breece Hall's touches? New head coach Aaron Glenn has already made it clear that he wants to use a committee approach in his first Jets backfield. Plus, Hall was rumored to be on the trading block this offseason. So don't expect a repeat of 2024, when Hall carried 209 times, compared to just 92 for Allen, who is now entering his second season. Hall carried 223 times in 2023. It would be a stunner if he cracked 200 this year.

Are the Jets committed to Justin Fields as the starting QB? Yes. They're going to give him plenty of opportunities in 2025, since they essentially committed to him for just one season (at $30 million), while giving him a two-year contract. Fields' backup, 36-year-old Tyrod Taylor, has no shot of being a long-term solution for the Jets. There's no point in them playing him, unless Fields gets hurt. Meanwhile, there is at least a chance Fields, 26, can be the Jets' long-awaited franchise quarterback. So they might as well lean into him as their starter this year.

After Garrett Wilson, which WR will get the most targets? There aren't a ton of great options, now that Davante Adams is gone. Wilson was targeted 154 times last year — 40 more than Adams. Allen Lazard, who is back but isn't a star, had 60 targets. No other Jets wide receiver in 2024 had more targets than Mike Williams' 21 — and he's long gone. The Jets didn't make any big-splash receiver additions in free agency or the draft. So while Wilson might wind up getting a lot more than 154 targets this year, expect Lazard to be a distant second.

BALTIMORE RAVENS

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

At 31, will Derrick Henry get 300-plus carries again? That's an ambitious workload for a 31-year-old, but Henry is no ordinary back. Still, a few things work against such a heavy load, beginning with Lamar Jackson and his singular running ability. The Ravens also upgraded at wide receiver by adding DeAndre Hopkins, and change-of-pace scatback Keaton Mitchell should be fully recovered from a 2023 ACL injury. The Ravens want to get him the ball. Henry might have a few 20-carry games, but the Ravens need him fresh for a late-season push.

At 33, can Hopkins be Baltimore's new WR1? Doubtful, and that isn't what the Ravens are expecting anyway. Zay Flowers was a 1,000-yard receiver last year, and he gets open in areas where Jackson loves to throw. Rashod Bateman is coming off a career-high nine touchdowns. Hopkins is an upgrade over Nelson Agholor (14-231, 2 TDs), but tight ends Mark Andrews and Isaiah Likely cut into targets for receivers. Hopkins had 56 catches for 610 yards last year, and he'll be hard-pressed to match that.

How much will Likely cut into Andrews' targets? A healthy amount. Likely is sure-handed and runs angry after the catch. Plus, Jackson trusts him. Andrews is still Jackson's favorite target on third down and near the end zone. Last year, Andrews set a team record with a touchdown catch in six straight games. That alone makes Andrews a good fantasy play, but Likely had 42% of the Ravens' tight end targets last year and it's reasonable to expect that again.

Who will be Cleveland's QB1? Joe Flacco is the favorite to win the starting job this summer. Flacco is by far the most experienced player in the four-man competition, and he also has the strongest arm and experience in Kevin Stefanski's offense. But the Browns have had at least four starting quarterbacks in the past two seasons, and if the season goes poorly, expect the rookies to get a long look in the back half of the season.

What should we expect from the Browns RBs? Quinshon Judkins will be the starter eventually — and likely sooner than later. Jerome Ford is a speed back who's had some big runs over the past two seasons, but he's been best as a No. 2. Judkins will be the team's short-yardage and goal-line back and should be viewed as the starter by fantasy players. Ford could be traded if the rookies perform well, as Ford is in the last year of his rookie contract. Dylan Sampson should only be fantasy-relevant if the Browns offense performs well and uses Sampson in the pass game.

Can Jerry Jeudy continue to be a fantasy-relevant wide receiver? Jeudy should continue to be a strong fantasy asset. He probably won't match the run he posted in late November and early December 2024, but Jeudy has elite speed and is the Browns' clear No. 1 wide receiver. Fantasy owners should have some hesitation based upon the Browns' shaky quarterback situation and the number of questions across the offensive depth chart, but Jeudy and tight end David Njoku are both strong bets for high volume and the occasional ceiling game even if the Browns end up being a pretty bad offense.

CINCINNATI BENGALS

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

How much will Zack Moss cut into Chase Brown's touches? Moss certainly will get carries, as he provides a bigger option in short-yardage and goal-line situations, but Brown should be viewed as the main man in Cincinnati. Brown's danger as both a runner and pass-catcher makes him a valuable, high-volume option as a part of one of the NFL's most potent offenses.

After his breakout 2024 season, can we expect Mike Gesicki to put up similar numbers in 2025? The Bengals made a significant investment in Gesicki this offseason, an indication he's going to be a big part of their plans in 2025. Cincinnati doesn't just throw around money for no reason, after all. Gesicki rarely misses games and is a big target for Joe Burrow, who will look to Gesicki whenever opposing defenses overcompensate with their coverage of Ja'Marr Chase and Tee Higgins.

How close can Burrow come to matching last season's career highs in yards (4,918) and touchdowns (43)? Burrow is coming off his best season yet, so expecting him to match or surpass those numbers could be a bit unfair. Ideally for Cincinnati, he doesn't have to, as he was forced to throw and throw and throw while the Bengals' defense couldn't keep the opposition out of the end zone. That said, the Bengals didn't do much to their defense in the offseason, so Burrow could once again be asked to shoulder the load.

PITTSBURGH STEELERS

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

Who gets more touches, Kaleb Johnson or Jaylen Warren? Johnson is expected to step in for Najee Harris, who departed in free agency after four so-so seasons in Pittsburgh. Despite tepid results, Harris got a boatload of touches, even with Warren waiting in the wings. Expect Johnson to make more out of those opportunities while Warren maintains his role as a change-of-pace back.

With George Pickens gone, how will the targets be distributed? Pittsburgh could be looking at a committee approach to its No. 2 receiving option behind DK Metcalf. Veteran Robert Woods was a sneaky-good addition, but he hasn't compiled more than 500 yards since the 2022 season. Calvin Austin III showed good progress between Year 1 and Year 2, going from 17 catches to 36, but he's not expected to be an every-game stat stuffer. Roman Wilson, who never saw the field as a rookie, could be worth a flier.

Is Will Howard the Steelers' QB of the future? Odds are, no. For every Tom Brady — and there's only one Tom Brady — there are countless other sixth-round quarterbacks who come and go across the NFL. Howard has championship pedigree, and the Steelers really like him, but he'll have to overcome the odds to latch on in the NFL.

HOUSTON TEXANS

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

Can Christian Kirk bounce back in his first season with the Texans? Availability is one of the greatest traits for a football player, and Kirk's lack of durability has curtailed his production for the past two years with just a combined 20 games, 14 starts and 84 catches for 1,166 yards and four touchdowns. He's healthy again after dealing with a broken collarbone and a core muscle injury the past two years, and his medical outlook defines his production and fantasy value. The Texans have penciled him in for a major role with lots of targets. It's up to him to stay on the field.

C.J. Stroud had 18 more TDs than INTs as a rookie in 2023 and then was plus-8 last season. Which number is more likely in 2025? The uptick in picks had a lot to do with trying to do too much, a reaction to a regression in pass protection while dealing with ineffective play-calling from since-fired offensive coordinator Bobby Slowik. A more efficient, balanced offense and a better offensive line could tilt those numbers toward 2023 levels. My hunch is that Stroud gets closer to 2023, but not quite the same TD-to-interception ratio as his NFL Offensive Rookie of the Year form.

Which rookie WR has a better chance to be fantasy relevant, Jayden Higgins or Jaylin Noel? Draft Higgins based on the investment the team made in him and his potential red-zone role as a bigger, higher-jumping wideout. Noel, if Kirk gets hurt, will have an increased role.

JACKSONVILLE JAGUARS

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

How much does Tank Bigsby cut into Travis Etienne Jr.'s touches? Bigsby shared carries with Etienne in 2024, and Bigsby figures to get significant carries in 2025. But the major storyline in the Jaguars' backfield in training camp and preseason will be Round 4 rookie Bhayshul Tuten, who likely will cut into carries for both Bigsby and Etienne. The Jaguars likely will play all three backs extensively in new head coach Liam Coen's system, with Round 7 rookie LeQuint Allen Jr. also expected to have a role.

Can TE Brenton Strange put up numbers similar to what Evan Engram had the past two seasons? Strange will enter 2025 as the Jaguars' starting and primary tight end. One of the better run-blocking tight ends in the NFL, Strange figures to significantly improve his statistics in Engram's absence after catching 40 passes for 411 yards and two touchdowns in 2025. He may not reach the 114 receptions for 963 yards Engram produced in 2023, but Strange absolutely can push his receptions to around 60-to-70 and his yardage into the 700 range. The Jaguars love Strange, and he will be integral to the offense.

Will Travis Hunter see enough playing time on offense to be fantasy relevant? Hunter, who is expected to play wide receiver and cornerback as a rookie, absolutely will get enough playing time to matter to fantasy owners. He is expected to play essentially full-time on offense, and he will practice about 75 percent of the week with the offense while working with the defense 25 percent of the week.

INDIANAPOLIS COLTS

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

Which RB is the best handcuff for Jonathan Taylor? While Khalil Herbert has NFL experience and is a suitable third-down back as a pass-catching option, the Colts hope rookie fifth-round pick DJ Giddens proves himself most worthy to spell Taylor on rush downs. Does that mean fantasy owners take a chance? Probably not. The best option is Herbert. But keep an eye on Giddens in camp.

What kind of numbers can we expect from rookie TE Tyler Warren? Don't be surprised if Warren has a 1,000-yard receiving season as a rookie. He's that good, and the Colts have a need for a go-to guy in the passing game. They will look to get him the ball early and often, so it's not unreasonable to expect 80-plus catches, and because he stretches the field, he should provide some decent yards per catch. He's not just a move-the-chains option.

Which receiver should we expect more out of this season, Alec Pierce or Josh Downs? As much as Pierce emerged as a deep threat, Downs is still trending more positively toward a stronger season. The Colts throw the ball more to Downs because he gets open with greater frequency and has the speed to also go deep. Pierce has made some big plays in winning contested battles, but that also means there are weeks where he doesn't come away with a big catch, and his numbers are down. Downs is the more consistent bet.

TENNESSEE TITANS

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

How much will Tyjae Spears cut into Tony Pollard's touches this season? The Titans are clearly concerned about wearing Pollard down. But Spears missed five games with injuries and had only 84 rushing attempts in 2024, his first season paired with Pollard. The team was determined to find a short-yardage type in the draft, and they chose 6-foot-2, 226-pound Kalel Mullings out of Michigan in the sixth round to fill that role. Pollard is likely to wind up in the same range as he was last year, with roughly 16 carries per game.

Titans QBs combined for 3,317 yards and 22 touchdowns in 2024. Will Cam Ward top those numbers? Ward should have better protection with the addition of Dan Moore Jr. at left tackle and Kevin Zeitler at right guard, and while the Titans didn't add premier receivers, they got a steady presence in Tyler Lockett and two intriguing rookies in fourth-rounders Chimere Dike and Elic Ayomanor. Second-year head coach Brian Callahan should guide Ward to production that exceeds what the team got in 2024.

Will Lockett cut into Calvin Ridley's productivity? No. Ridley should lead the way after a 1,017-yard debut season with the Titans. But Ward is a point-guard type of quarterback. Lockett will be his second-best guy, but the Titans will have a variety of other options for the rookie QB to distribute to. The group will be whittled after camp, but it could include Dike and Ayomanor; Bryce Oliver, who showed promise last season; Van Jefferson, who they think they can rejuvenate; undrafted Ward favorite Xavier Restrepo from Miami (Fla.); and maybe even Treylon Burks, who's on his last chance.

DENVER BRONCOS

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

Which running back is expected to have more touches, Audric Estime or rookie RJ Harvey? Head coach Sean Payton's infatuation with using multiple backs makes projections fuzzy. But the Broncos believe Harvey can carve out a significant role, which should translate to 850 rushing yards and five touchdowns. The expectation is that he will get more playing time than Estime, but the former Notre Dame star should be able to produce six scores as a goal-line option. But Broncos backs remain a dangerous fantasy league proposition because of Payton's reluctance to commit to a bell-cow back.

Will an improved running game mean fewer designed runs for Bo Nix? It should not. Payton understands Nix's athleticism better in his second season. The quarterback led the Broncos in explosive runs last season, and while Harvey will supplant him in that category, Nix's speed, ability to make defenders miss and protect himself will keep plenty of called runs in the game plan.

How much will TE Evan Engram cut into Courtland Sutton's targets? Sutton will not top last season's career-high of 81 receptions, partly because of Engram's presence and Marvin Mims Jr.'s development. Think in terms of 70 catches for 1,000 yards and eight touchdowns. Nix trusts him to make contested plays, leaving him a top target on third down. Engram will take away some of Sutton's receptions, likely finishing around 75 for 700 yards. But four scores is a fair projection based on recent seasons, leaving Sutton as the top red-zone threat.

LAS VEGAS RAIDERS

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

Even with rookie running back Ashton Jeanty, will Raheem Mostert vulture the goal-line carries? And don't forget about rookie defensive tackle JJ Pegues, who was a short-yardage demon at Ole Miss. The Raiders certainly have some options at the goal line, and Mostert will get his touches. But if Jeanty plays a huge role in getting them into that situation, expect new head coach Pete Carroll to reward his rookie back with touchdown chances.

Will Carroll's run-first approach have a negative effect on tight end Brock Bowers' numbers? The Raiders threw the ball 635 times last year, which is far too many. Carroll is determined to do something about that. But even if they cut that by 120 thanks to a more intentional and improved run game, Bowers will remain the featured component of the passing game. And with a much more accurate quarterback throwing him the ball, matching last season's catch total of 111 could still be in play simply because Geno Smith will be more efficient with his targets.

Can Jakobi Meyers improve on his career-best numbers of receptions (87) and yards (1,027)? Probably not. The Raiders added three wide receivers in the draft, including second-rounder Jack Bech from TCU, not to mention Jeanty, who was among the best pass-catching running backs in the country two years ago. Both expect to be active in new offensive coordinator Chip Kelly's passing game. If Meyers simply replicates his numbers from last year, with everyone else getting their touches, the Raiders' passing attack has a chance to be much more versatile and dynamic.

KANSAS CITY CHIEFS

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

Travis Kelce produced the lowest yardage and touchdown numbers of his 11 years as a starter. Will his numbers continue to slide? Slide? That may be harsh. While he's clearly no longer the top fantasy tight end, the target volume remains elite, even if Father Time has slowed Kelce after the catch. As long as Patrick Mahomes is pulling the trigger, Kelce will see plenty of passes thrown his way. Last season, Kelce finished fifth in yards (823) and third in receptions (97) among NFL TEs. It's reasonable to think he'll remain a high-volume target with the potential for his TD production (three) to rise.

If Isiah Pacheco stays healthy, will he get enough touches to be an RB1 in fantasy? Probably not. He's had 20 or more carries only twice in 38 career games, most recently in Week 4 of 2023. Pacheco has struggled to stay healthy, and the Chiefs have constructed a backfield designed to spread around carries, with Kareem Hunt returning as a battering ram between the tackles and the additions of Elijah Mitchell and seventh-round pick Brashard Smith, who could siphon off catches and carries.

If Hollywood Brown and Rashee Rice are both healthy, which receiver gets more targets? Rice is the correct answer, with the caveat that he could face a suspension if the criminal case for his hit-and-run in March 2024 proceeds this summer. Rice was poised for a massive sophomore fantasy season before a season-ending knee injury in Week 4 last season, averaging nearly 10 targets and 100 yards per game through the first three weeks.

LOS ANGELES CHARGERS

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

Will Najee Harris or rookie Omarion Hampton get enough carries to be fantasy-relevant running backs? In a Jim Harbaugh–Greg Roman offense, there's enough rushing volume to keep multiple backs fantasy-relevant. The Chargers ranked 11th in carries last season (462), even without the talent and durability they now have in Harris and Hampton. The early question is who will emerge as the lead back. Harris is the safe bet to start the season as RB1, with Hampton gradually working in — unless he has a blockbuster camp and preseason. A near-even workload would muddy the fantasy waters.

Can rookie Oronde Gadsden II win the starting TE job? The Chargers didn't make headlines signing Tyler Conklin, but a one-year, $3 million deal signals intent. The team has historically relied on veteran tight ends. Expect a rotation of Conklin and Will Dissly, who finished fourth on the team in targets (64) last year. Gadsden has long-term potential, but for now, he's a stash, waiting his turn.

How much will the return of Mike Williams cut into Ladd McConkey's targets? McConkey is the safest piece in this offense. He led the team in receiving last season by a mile and won't have to fight for targets. If anything, he's in line for more as he and Justin Herbert continue building a rapport. Don't worry about Williams cutting in — he never led the Chargers in targets, and at nearly 31, he's not about to start. His return might eat into snaps for Quentin Johnston or Derius Davis, but betting on a Williams resurgence is chasing fool's gold. Last season was a steep drop-off, and the trend isn't reversing.

DALLAS COWBOYS

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

Can Dak Prescott bounce back from another season-ending injury? If Prescott stays healthy, he will be the quarterback he has been throughout his career. His 17-game average is 4,381 passing yards, 30 touchdowns and 11 interceptions. He will put up similar numbers this year if healthy. Therein lies the concern: Prescott had a dislocated ankle in 2020, a right calf strain in 2021 and a torn hamstring in 2024. His legs certainly aren't what they used to be. He ran 241 times for 1,221 yards and 21 touchdowns in his first four seasons and only 179 times for 717 yards and eight touchdowns the past five.

Will George Pickens help or hinder CeeDee Lamb's value? Pickens' presence should not affect Lamb's numbers one way or the other. Lamb is one of the best receivers in football and will continue to be. What should help him more than Pickens is a healthy shoulder. Lamb was banged up much of last season, which is why his numbers were down from 2023. He played 175 fewer snaps in 2024 than the previous season.

Who will emerge from a lackluster running back room? The Cowboys tried a running back by committee in 2024. It didn't work. That's why they signed veterans Javonte Williams and Miles Sanders and drafted Texas' Jaydon Blue and Clemson's Phil Mafah. Blue is the favorite to win the starting job despite his lack of NFL experience. Head coach Brian Schottenheimer, though, values running backs for their receiving ability, which is why the Cowboys signed Williams, who likely will serve as the third-down back.

PHILADELPHIA EAGLES

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

Can Saquon Barkley repeat his incredible 2024 campaign? No. In 2024, Barkley became the ninth back to top 2,000 rushing yards in a season. None of the other eight came within 500 yards of that total the next year. The Eagles have a new offensive coordinator, and they may not run the ball enough to have Barkley lead the league in carries again. Also, in Barkley's previous five seasons, he played every game just once and missed a total of 20 contests.

Will A.J. Brown and DeVonta Smith both remain high-end WR options in fantasy? Absolutely. The Eagles' lack of depth at wideout makes it imperative that both are highly active and productive. Philadelphia didn't draft a receiver, and last year's conscripts didn't exactly demonstrate All-Pro capabilities. Even though the Birds ran it often last year, they still needed to pass, and it's likely new offensive coordinator Kevin Patullo will put it up more than his predecessor did. That means plenty of opportunities for Brown and Smith.

Can Jalen Hurts stay healthy for the entire season? Yes. Hurts is still going to run the ball. It's part of who he is, and the Eagles need him to be a weapon on the ground. But he has been more judicious at the end of plays. He rarely puts his head down to gain an extra yard and can even be seen sliding well before he might get hit. Hurts is still aggressive at times, especially when the Eagles absolutely need a first down, but he has tempered his reckless tendencies. Plus, he has missed only four games across the past four seasons.

NEW YORK GIANTS

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

Will any of the Giants' new QBs move the needle for fantasy managers? Not really. Russell Wilson is going to be the starter as long as he's healthy and the Giants are competent. Had he played all 17 games last season, he was on pace for 3,800 yards and 25 touchdowns. That's about what you should expect from him, though he was on a better team in Pittsburgh. If Jameis Winston has to play, he'll be the usual mix of big plays and multiple interceptions. Rookie Jaxson Dart is worth stashing for 2026.

Will a reliable WR2 emerge behind Malik Nabers? The Giants think they have two good ones ready to explode — Darius Slayton and Wan'Dale Robinson. But that's hard to believe based on past performance. Robinson's problem is his height (5-8) and the fact that he was supposed to be about shiftiness and speed, yet he only averaged 7.5 yards per catch (and 3.9 yards after the catch) last season. Slayton, meanwhile, caught just 54.9% of the passes thrown his way. It'll still be The Nabers Show.

Who will be the most valuable running back, Tyrone Tracy Jr. or Cam Skattebo? There is a real opening for Skattebo if he's what everyone seems to think he is, which is a Christian McCaffrey-like weapon. He should be pretty valuable as the No. 2 back and maybe as a pass-catcher in the third-down role, too. Tracy will begin camp, and probably the season, as the starter. But remember that for all the excitement surrounding him last season, he averaged just 42 rushing yards per game over the last seven weeks on just 3.5 yards per carry. Skattebo could be explosive if he gets some blocking.

WASHINGTON COMMANDERS

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

Will Jayden Daniels build on his rookie success or suffer a sophomore slump? The dreaded sophomore slump has victimized the likes of Robert Griffin III, Dak Prescott and C.J. Stroud in recent years. As with those QBs, opponents now have a year's worth of film to glean Daniels' tendencies. The Commanders aimed to mitigate those effects by bolstering Daniels' supporting cast, from his offensive line to his stable of pass-catching targets. But after almost everything broke perfectly for Daniels in 2024, culminating in a berth in the NFC Championship Game, it wouldn't be a surprise to see some regression in 2025.

Can Deebo Samuel stay healthy and remain an impact player? Samuel averaged 14 starts and 96 targets over the past four seasons in San Francisco, but he is likely to be more of a secondary option for Daniels in Washington in 2025, given the returns of the quarterback's two favorite 2024 targets in wideout Terry McLaurin and tight end Zach Ertz. While Samuel, even at 29, is a more explosive, more prolific receiver, he may not see the type of high-volume action he was used to with the 49ers.

Will Brian Robinson Jr. and Austin Ekeler weigh down each other's fantasy value? For all his benefits as a third-down back, Ekeler's rushing production bottomed out in 2024. At 30, he's unlikely to get more productive. In other words, things are set up for Robinson to be more of a workhorse for the Commanders in 2025. Before Ekeler's arrival, in fact, he had shown some prowess catching passes out of the backfield, with 36 receptions and four touchdown catches in 2023.

CHICAGO BEARS

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

Will an improved supporting cast help Caleb Williams reach his lofty ceiling? The Bears have put second-year quarterback Caleb Williams in position to become the elite player they envisioned. During the offseason, they hired top head-coaching candidate Ben Johnson, revamped their interior offensive line by trading for Pro Bowl guards Joe Thuney and Jonah Jackson and signing free-agent center Drew Dalman and spent their first two draft picks on tight end Colston Loveland and receiver Luther Burden III.

How will the Bears' rookie additions cut into target share for returning pass-catchers? Loveland and Burden are both capable of earning prominent roles on offense, which would reduce the number of passes thrown to veteran returnees. It's a talented group that includes receivers DJ Moore and Rome Odunze, tight end Cole Kmet and running back D'Andre Swift. Loveland appealed to the Bears due to his dynamic ability to separate from defenders as well as create mismatches. Burden is an explosive Deebo Samuel-type whom the Bears viewed as the best run-after-catch receiver in the draft.

Can Swift be the featured back? Swift established a career high with 1,345 yards from scrimmage last season (959 rushing and 386 receiving), but the Bears didn't have another running back run for more than 150 yards. That could change this year if Johnson tries to replicate the success he enjoyed as Lions offensive coordinator with the 1-2 punch of Jahmyr Gibbs and David Montgomery, who combined to rush for 28 TDs last season while sharing the workload.

DETROIT LIONS

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

How will the departure of Ben Johnson impact the offense? No team piled up more yards or scored more touchdowns than the Lions did under Johnson the past three seasons. But his successor, John Morton, actually helped install the offense in Detroit as a senior assistant in 2022. So don't expect the philosophy to change or the fireworks to fizzle. The dominant run game and third-down efficiency will remain a priority, and Morton won't ditch the heavy play-action diet that Jared Goff craves.

Can Goff avoid random spurts of critical turnovers? Goff has been a top-10 fantasy quarterback three straight seasons. Last year, he was also fourth in interceptions (12), but four of those came in the first three weeks as the Lions' offense worked through some red-zone issues. Five more came in a bizarre comeback win at Houston in November. Goff posted career highs in completion percentage and passer rating, but he'll always be prone to turnover glitches.

Will Amon-Ra St. Brown and Jahmyr Gibbs both remain elite fantasy producers? There isn't a more consistent receiver in the NFL than St. Brown, who remains a top-five fantasy wideout. St. Brown saw a slight drop in his target share last season with the emergence of Jameson Williams, but his red-zone chances increased, and he'll continue to be Goff's No. 1 target. The only thing holding Gibbs back from No. 1 RB status is a backfield timeshare with David Montgomery. That's likely to continue in similar fashion with a 60-40 split, but Gibbs showed just how valuable he could be with more touches.

GREEN BAY PACKERS

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

How much of an impact can Matthew Golden make as a rookie? While his first-round draft status certainly differentiates him from the other wideouts in the receiver room — after all, it had been 23 years since the Packers took a wide receiver in the first round — it does not automatically confer No. 1 receiver status. Jayden Reed has led the Packers in catches and receiving yards both of his years with the team, and he has a built-in rapport with quarterback Jordan Love that Golden must now build.

Will Josh Jacobs have another dominant fantasy campaign? How could anyone bet against Jacobs after the boffo first season he had in Green Bay? Especially after the Packers upgraded their line this offseason. If new left guard Aaron Banks and left guard-turned-center Elgton Jenkins are better road-graders, Jacobs should match or surpass his 2024 numbers.

Can Love ascend to the upper echelon of fantasy quarterbacks? Love's second year as the starter was not what the Packers had hoped — nor was it what he had hoped for himself. He has talked about wanting to use his legs more, but the truth is he's a lot like his predecessor, Aaron Rodgers: He likes to use his legs to extend plays and make downfield throws instead of running just to run. Even with the draft additions of Golden and Savion Williams at wideout, the offense isn't going to require Love to carry the load like Rodgers used to. So expect good-but-not-great numbers from Love.

MINNESOTA VIKINGS

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

Is J.J. McCarthy ready to become a full-time, high-quality starter? There will be some understandable growing pains after missing all of his rookie season because of a knee injury, but the short answer is yes. He has absolutely everything he needs to live up to being a 10th overall pick — elite weapons, a totally rebuilt interior line (finally!) and the fact that he was hand-picked by Kevin O'Connell, who won NFL Coach of the Year after transforming Sam Darnold from an NFL flop to a $100 million, 14-win starting quarterback. O'Connell has an even grander vision for McCarthy and deserves the benefit of the doubt.

How will the loss of Darnold impact Minnesota's high-value pass-catchers? Not enough to avoid drafting them. Darnold's success was more a product of O'Connell's system and the surrounding talent. McCarthy also has top-10 skills, and the talent around him should be even better. Yes, McCarthy has never played in a regular-season NFL game. But he spent a year learning the system and should be ready to feed the ball to the likes of Justin Jefferson, Jordan Addison and T.J. Hockenson.

How much will Jordan Mason cut into Aaron Jones Sr.'s fantasy value? I would argue that less will be more for Jones, a special dual-threat back who's 5-foot-9, 208 pounds and now 30 years old. Jones is deceptively powerful, but time spent between the tackles took a toll on him as he got beat up and worn down while compiling career highs in carries (255) and touches (306) last year. Splitting time with a bigger back like Mason should make Jones a more consistent big-play threat.

ATLANTA FALCONS

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

Is this the year tight end Kyle Pitts finally delivers on the high expectations of being a top-5 pick? Pitts may never live up to those high expectations, if only because it's just very hard for a tight end to achieve that level in the NFL. Playing with Michael Penix Jr. should give him real stability at the quarterback position. When Kirk Cousins was playing at his best last year, so was Pitts. When Cousins struggled, Pitts faded a bit on the stat sheet. If Penix can build on his impressive first three starts, Pitts should rise with the tide.

Will Penix maximize the talented weapons around him? Penix flashed a ton during his first three starts last season, and getting an entire offseason as the entrenched starter should help him jell with Atlanta's best options in the passing game and with offensive coordinator Zac Robinson. That synergy is crucial to helping a quarterback build chemistry with his pass-catchers, so the sky is the limit for what Penix can do with this group. Sure, there will bumps in the road as Penix settles into his first full season starting, but his 2024 starts suggest real potential for fireworks.

Can Bijan Robinson be this year's fantasy MVP? Robinson had a tremendous sophomore campaign, and the Falcons will continue to lean on him as Penix gets settled into full-time starting duties. Robinson hasn't even reached his full potential yet, and the abundance of options Atlanta has on offense shouldn't diminish his reps and end-zone opportunities too much. Whether or not he's the fantasy MVP will largely depend on how the rest of the league's most talented players play, but Robinson should be a contender for sure.

NEW ORLEANS SAINTS

INSIDE THE LOCKER ROOM

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

Will Chris Olave be able to stay healthy? If he did, it would be the first time in his pro career. Olave has missed at least one game in each of his first three seasons, and he was limited to just eight contests last year after suffering multiple concussions. There is a chance, given the serious nature of those injuries, that Olave and the Saints have found some sort of solution — potentially even wearing a guardian cap, which Olave considered last season.

How much will a lackluster quarterback situation impact the fantasy value of the Saints' top weapons? It should place a cap on any of their skill-position players. Even with the arrival of head coach Kellen Moore, who has coordinated top-10 offenses in four of the past six years, Derek Carr's retirement and Tyler Shough's unknown ceiling should make you avoid taking players like Olave, Rashid Shaheed and Alvin Kamara early in the draft. They may ultimately go off, but the risk likely outweighs the reward.

Will Kamara finally lose a step at 30 after heavy usage? It's not so much the age and the usage for Kamara that give me pause — it's more about how the new staff will deploy him. He was an ideal fit for the wide zone scheme used by last year's offensive coordinator, Klint Kubiak, and New Orleans leaned on him hard as their other offensive weapons dealt with injury. Moore's rushing attack will incorporate both gap and zone schemes, and he may decide to limit Kamara's touches with a committee approach.

CAROLINA PANTHERS

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

Will Bryce Young pick up where he left off after a strong finish to the 2024 season? The Panthers are counting on it. The offense is being built around Young's strengths, and the Panthers skipped out on defense in the first round of the 2025 NFL Draft to give Young another big-time weapon in WR Tetairoa McMillan. Young's last few games of 2024 showcased a player the Panthers hadn't really seen before — fluid, athletic and confident in his decision-making. He's not going to be a top-10 quarterback in terms of numbers in 2025, but he's continuing to trend up.

Will Chuba Hubbard be a top-10 RB, or will new acquisition Rico Dowdle or fourth-round pick Trevor Etienne eat into his workload? The Panthers know what they have in Hubbard, who is coming off an 1,195-yard, 10-TD year. He's the clear No. 1, and Carolina won't be using a backfield-by-committee approach, even though Dowdle is coming off a 1,000-yard rushing season himself in Dallas.

How much of an instant impact can top-10 pick Tetairoa McMillan make as a rookie? Be cautious. As much as Young campaigned for McMillan to be the Panthers' first-round draft pick, that good feeling was based on a very limited sample size of Young throwing to McMillan in the offseason. Young is far more familiar with veteran Adam Thielen. And Carolina's Xavier Legette, the team's first-round draft pick in 2024, returns as well and has a somewhat similar skill set to McMillan.

TAMPA BAY BUCCANEERS

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

Can Mike Evans and Chris Godwin avoid injuries this time around? Tampa Bay suffered through a four-game losing streak last season with both of their star pass-catchers out. Evans will be 32 this season, while Godwin is nearing 30, so durability could continue to be a concern. That said, the emergence of rookie Jalen McMillan last season and the addition of first-round pick Emeka Egbuka could help the Bucs manage snaps/workload for Evans and Godwin, keeping them fresh and healthy through the year.

How will Bucky Irving follow up his stellar rookie campaign? A fourth-round pick last year, Irving was a fantasy revelation as a rookie, proving to be one of the most explosive and versatile backs in the league. He slowly took over the starting job from Rachaad White and should enter 2025 as Tampa Bay's lead back. Keeping the majority of the offensive coaching staff intact despite the departure of offensive coordinator Liam Coen should help Irving build on his rookie-year success and put up even bigger numbers in his sophomore campaign.

Will Baker Mayfield deliver another impressive fantasy season? After signing a three-year extension following a career year in 2023, Mayfield raised the bar to a whole new level in 2024, becoming the only quarterback in NFL history to top 4,500 passing yards, 45 touchdown passes and a 71.3% completion rate in the same season. His entire starting offense is back this season; the scheme won't change much with Josh Grizzard's promotion to replace Coen; and Mayfield hopefully won't have to deal with losing Evans for a month and Godwin for more than half the season.

ARIZONA CARDINALS

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

Will Marvin Harrison Jr. make a bigger splash in his second season? On paper, Harrison's 885 yards and eight touchdowns make for a solid rookie campaign, but he'd be the first to say that it didn't meet his standard. The game slowed down for him as the season progressed, and he should be more prepared come September. He's been in the facility daily throughout the offseason and added more muscle, planning for physical battles with NFL cornerbacks. If the offseason bond between Kyler Murray and Harrison transfers to Sundays, a big season is incoming for the wide receiver.

Can Murray find consistency on a weekly basis? Murray continues to show flashes of greatness. Even during the 2024 season, from Weeks 7-11, he was in the conversation for MVP. As Murray faded, so did the entire team. He's proven that he can play sometimes-spectacular football; he just needs to string those performances together. He knows that he needs to use his legs more frequently, and from a fantasy perspective, more rushing touchdowns will make owners quite happy. Recognizing the significance of this season, there is urgency for Murray to perform in 2025.

Will 30-year-old James Conner keep holding off Trey Benson for the lead role in the backfield? If you're the Cardinals, there is zero need to rush Benson's development when Conner continues to defy his age, recording back-to-back 1,000-plus rushing seasons. Conner has been the heartbeat of the Cardinals offense and doesn't appear to be slowing down anytime soon. He also remains a valuable mentor for Benson.

LOS ANGELES RAMS

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

Will wide receiver Davante Adams be an adequate replacement for Cooper Kupp? The expectation from the Rams is that he will outperform Kupp's output from the past three seasons. Adams gives the Rams a much-needed target in the red zone, someone who can beat man coverage and win one-on-one in tight spaces. But he also stays healthy despite his age at 32, something Kupp has struggled to do since 2021.

How much does Matthew Stafford have left in the tank? Stafford has taken a beating behind some bad offensive lines throughout his career, so the age cliff could appear quickly. But he's missed only one game due to injury across the past two seasons. With a little better health from his offensive line and receivers this season, Stafford could reach the 4,000-yard passing mark again for the first time since 2021 and showcase that he still has a couple of good years left, even at 37.

Will Kyren Williams remain the top dog in the backfield? The Rams have talked about a potential contract extension for Williams, so the likelihood is, yes, he will remain the top back. But he might not be as much of a workhorse this year as the Rams try to build some change-of-pace packages around explosive rookie Jarquez Hunter.

SAN FRANCISCO 49ERS

INSIDE THE LOCKER ROOM

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

When will Brandon Aiyuk be back to full strength? Head coach Kyle Shanahan has said "there's a chance" Aiyuk could play in Week 1, but he stopped well short of making any guarantee. Aiyuk's knee injury was similar to the multi-ligament tear that pass-rusher Nick Bosa suffered in September 2020. Bosa was medically cleared for the start of training camp in July 2021, about 10 months after his surgery. Aiyuk, who had surgery in November, could be cleared around mid-September if he's on a similar timeline.

Can Christian McCaffrey stay healthy for the whole season? The odds are against it. McCaffrey is entering his age-29 season, ranks fifth among active players in career touches (1,871) and has missed 37 of his past 84 games due to Achilles tendinitis, a partially torn knee ligament, a strained calf and ankle, thigh, shoulder and hamstring injuries. Said McCaffrey after reporting to the offseason program in late April: "I'm feeling great."

Will Brock Purdy's contract situation be a distraction that impacts his play? The 49ers' front office is working to make this a non-issue, partly due to their history. They have had long contract negotiations with tight end George Kittle (2020), Deebo Samuel (2022), Bosa (2023), left tackle Trent Williams (2024) and Aiyuk (2024) that have extended deep into the offseason. In each case, the player cashed in and embarked on a season that was marred by a subpar performance and/or injuries.

SEATTLE SEAHAWKS

AN NFL INSIDER FIELDS KEY FANTASY QUESTIONS

Will Sam Darnold live up to his contract? It's going to be very tough. After operating in a perfect system under Kevin O'Connell, Darnold will be working behind Seattle's offensive line, which has big question marks even after the addition of Grey Zabel in the first round. If the line holds up and Cooper Kupp stays healthy, Darnold has some strong skill players around him who could make his life easier, but it will be very difficult to sustain the level of play he showed in Minnesota.

Can the addition of Kupp offset the losses of DK Metcalf and Tyler Lockett? When healthy, Kupp is a great addition to offset the losses of Metcalf and Lockett, but he may not be enough on his own. He has missed 18 games over the past three years, and his skill set could complement Jaxon Smith-Njigba very well, giving new offensive coordinator Clint Kubiak an opportunity to utilize the pair in the same manner that Kupp was deployed with the Los Angeles Rams alongside Puka Nacua.

Will Kenneth Walker III and Zach Charbonnet limit each other's fantasy ceiling? Walker and Charbonnet have found a nice balance that maximizes both talents when healthy. Walker's ability to shoulder a heavy workload keeps his floor somewhat high, especially since he's been one of the league's most reliable scorers in the red zone. Charbonnet's pass-catching ability, along with Walker's lingering health issues that have caused him to miss 10 games in three years, make him one of fantasy football's most valuable handcuffs.
